all the ingredients for the agapē, from which the elements for the Supper were selected, were furnished by the free-will offerings of the believers. These were solemnly set apart by the officiating bishop with a consecrating prayer, eucharistia, and thus the sacrament obtained the name "Eucharist." The gifts themselves were called prosphora, "oblations," or thusiai, "sacrifices." The sacrificial conception of the Supper was thus gradually created (Ign., Phil. iv; Smyrna, vii, viii; Justin, Apol., 1,66; Dial., xli,70; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., iv,18,5). The Eucharist once being conceived as a sacrifice, the conception of the officiating bishop as a priest became logically inevitable. The Apos Const, xlii (4) gives us a fair idea of the worship of the church, toward the close of the 3d cent. Even at that early day a well-developed ritual had replaced the simplicity of the worship of the apostolic days. In the African and Eastern churches, baptized children were allowed to partake of communion, through the fear engendered by Jn 6 53. The regenerative conception of baptism largely influenced this custom. The remnants of the consecrated elements were brought by the deacons to the sick and to imprisoned believers. We have not the space in a brief article like this to enter fully into the development of the doctrinal conception of the Supper as found in the Fathers. Suffice it to say that the symbolical and spiritual concept of the Eucharist, usually defined as the "dynamic" view of the Supper, was advocated by such men as Origen, Eusebius of Caesarea, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzen and others. On the other hand Cyril, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom and John Damascenus developed the "realistic" theory of the Eucharist, and this view again divided itself into the "diophysitic" theory, later called "consubstantiation," and the "monophysitic" theory, later known as "transubstantiation." Augustine, the great Lat Father, knew nothing of the theory of transubstantiation. He taught that communion carries a blessing only for believers, while to the unbelieving it is a curse, and that the true eating of the body of Christ consists in believing (Serm. Ad Infantes, De Civ., x,6; xxii,10; Tract. 25 in Joann.). Paschasius Radbert (d. 865 AD) was the first fully to formulate the realistic view as the doctrine of the Romish church, and although the dynamic view triumphed for a while, the condemnation of Berengarius of Tours (d. 1088 AD) proved that by the middle of the 11th cent. the realistic view of the Supper had become the generally accepted doctrine of the Eucharist.

The Romish church couches its doctrine of the Eucharist in the word "transubstantiation," which means the conversion of the substance

5. Rome and the Eucharist of the elements used in the Eucharist. The word was first used by Hildebert of Tours (d. 1134 AD) in a sermon.

The doctrine of the Supper was finally fixed, together with the new term, by Pope Innocent III, at the Lateran Council 1215 AD. It was decided that the body and blood of Christ are truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, under the species of bread and wine, the bread being transubstantiated into the body and the wine into the blood of Christ, by the Divine power. This has been the Romish doctrine of the Supper ever since. The bread and wine are changed into the veritable body and blood of Christ, by the words of the institution. By the institution of the Supper, Christ made His disciples priests, wherefore the Eucharist may be administered only by an ordained priest. In the miracle of the sacrament, the "accidents" of the elements—bread and wine—remain, but they are no longer inherent in a subject, the substance in which they inhered being replaced by another. This new substance is the body and blood of Christ, which is hidden from observation under the appearance of the elements. The whole Christ is present in each of these elements, hence it is not necessary to commune under both forms (sub utraque). In the Romish conception of the Supper communion with Christ is a secondary idea. The main idea is that of the transubstantiation itself, for the Supper is more a sacrifice than a sacrament; thus the mass becomes a sin offering. While it feeds faith, keeps us from mortal sin, wards off temporal punishment, unites believers, it also has a potency for those who are not present, and even for the dead in purgatory. Thus the mass became the very heart and center of the entire Romish cultus (Conf. Trid., XIII, 21, 22; Cat. Rom., CXII, c. 4; Bellarm, De Sacr. Euch., I, iv; Moehler, Symb., § 34).

The Reformers rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation, the sacrificial conception of the Eucharist, the adoration of the "host," the withholding of the cup, the efficiency of the Eucharist in behalf of the dead, the entire Romish conception of the sacrament of the Supper. The original position of Luther, that the elements in the Supper were signs and seals of the remission of sins, was soon replaced by the doctrine of "consubstantiation." The bitter controversy with Carlstadt, and esp. the failure of the Marburg Conference, drove Luther forever into the camp of the realists. As early as 1524 he had outlined his doctrine against Carlstadt. He placed himself squarely on the realistic conception of the words of the institution, and held that "the body of Christ in accordance with the will and omnipotence of God and its own ubiquity is really and substantially present in, with and under the Supper, even as His Divine nature is in the human as warmth is in the iron. Wherefore the Supper is physically partaken of by those who are unworthy, albeit to their own destruction" (Bavineck, Geref. Dogm., IV, 318). This doctrine has been fully developed by the Lutheran divines, and is till this day the view of the Lutheran church.

Zwingli essentially sided with Carlstadt in his controversy with Luther, whom he thereby greatly embittered. He interpreted the words of the institution—"this is"—as signifying "this stands for," "this signifies." This view was fully set forth in a letter to Matthew Alber at Reutlingen in 1524 and was given its final form in his dogmatic tract, Com. de vera et falsa rel. (1525), where he characterizes Luther's doctrine as "an opinion not only rustic but even impious and frivolous." The breach was widened by the Marburg Conference of 1529. Reduced to its last analysis, the eucharistic concept of Zwingli is that of a symbolical memorial of the suffering and death of Christ, although Zwingli does not deny that Christ is present to the eye of faith. On the contrary, He is enjoyed through the word and through faith, i.e. in a spiritual way. In the Supper we confess our faith, we express what that faith means to us, and we do it in memory of Christ's death (Oper., ii.1, 426; iii.239, 326, 459; iv.51, 68). The Zwinglian view has been consciously or unconsciously adopted by a very large portion of the Protestant church.

Calvin's position on the doctrine of the Eucharist tends rather to the Lutheran than to the Zwinglian view. With Zwingli the sacrament is little more than a sign, with Calvin it is both a sign and a seal. The reality of communion with Christ and the benefits of His death, received by a living faith—all this is common to the Lutheran and the Calvinistic views. The Lord's Supper is far more than a mere memorial service, it is a marvelous means of grace as well. Calvin sides with Zwingli in denying all physical, local or substantial presence of Christ in the Eucharist. But he differs from him in making the eucharistic act far more than a confession of faith, and he lays far greater stress than Zwingli on the meaning of its true participation. With Luther he holds that Christ is truly present in the Supper, and he lays stress esp. on the mystic union of the believer with Christ. In the Supper both the benefits of Christ's death and His glorious person are touched. But Christ does not descend in the Supper to the believer, but the latter ascends to Him in heaven. The central thought of the Calvinistic conception of the Supper is this, that the communicant, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, comes in spiritual contact with the entire person of Christ and that he is thus fed unto life eternal. Every close student of Calvin's works will have to admit that his ideas on the subject are somewhat involved and confusing. This is due no doubt to the mediating position he occupied between Luther and Zwingli. But his position as a whole is quite plain. All his followers agree in holding that (1) Christ is only spiritually present in the Supper; (2) that the participation in the benefits of the Supper must therefore be spiritual, although it is real, and (3) that only true communicants, by a living faith, can communicate therein, and that this participation in the atoning death of the Saviour is sealed to us by the use of the ordained signs of the sacrament. - I. The Term.—"Eucharist" is the anglicized form of the Gr noun eucharistia, which signifies "gratitude," "thanks," or "praise offering." The noun is derived from the vb. eucharistēō, which, with the vb. eulogēō of kindred meaning in Mt 26 26,27; Mk 14 22,23, is used to describe the action of the Lord in blessing the bread and wine at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Lk 22 19; 1 Cor 11 23). When used absolutely, as in these places, it signifies "the offering up of praise that is prompted by nothing else than God Himself and His revealed glory" (Cremer). The blessing of the physical elements was part of the sacramental action at subsequent celebrations of the ordinance (1 Cor 10 16), and thus eucharistia soon (2d cent.) came to mean the blessed elements and the entire ordinance in which these were administered.

Other Scriptural terms for the same ordinance are "Communion" (from koinōnia, in the twofold sense indicated in 1 Cor 10 16,17). "Lord's Supper" (kuriakón deipnon [1 Cor 11 20]), "Lord's Table" (trápēza kuriou [1 Cor 10 21], "Breaking of Bread" (khlasis tou artiou [Acts 2 42]). The lit. of the church developed a great many terms which emphasize one or the other feature of the ordinance. Luther, in his Small Catechism, adopts the name "Sacrament of the Altar," because it is administered at the altar. The Lutheran Confessions occasionally employ the term "mass," however, in the original meaning which the early church, not in that which the Roman church, connects with the term ("mass" derived either from missa, "things sent," because the materials for communion were sent to the place of celebration, or from missio, "a sending [away]," because worshippers who were not members, or minors, were dismissed from the service before the celebration of the Eucharist began; but see McClintock and Strong, Cyclop. of Bib., Theol., and Eccles. Lit., V, 863).

II. The Ordinance.—The "seats of doctrine," i.e. the Scripture texts which must be employed for determining every essential part of the teaching of Scripture regarding the

1. Source and Norm of the Doctrine of the Eucharist second sacrament of the Christian church, are the words of institution recorded in Mt 26 26-28; Mk 14 22-24; Lk 22 19,20; 1 Cor 11 23-25.

Valuable statements, chiefly concerning the proper use of the sacrament, are found in 1 Cor 10 15 ff; 11 20 ff. That these texts are controverted is no reason why a doctrine should not be established from them. No doctrine of the Christian religion could be established, if every text of Scripture had to be withdrawn from the argument, so soon as it had become controverted. Jn 6 32-59 does not treat of this ordinance, because (1) the ordinance must be dated from the night of the betrayal, which was considerably after the Lord's discourse at Capernaum; (2) because this passage speaks of "eating the flesh," not the body, of the Son of man, and of drinking "his blood," in such a manner that a person's eternal salvation is made to depend upon this eating and drinking. If this passage were eucharistic, infants, children, persons in durance among pagans, or temporarily deprived of the ministration of the Christian church, hence, unable to commune, could not be saved.

The exposition of the genuine eucharistic texts of Scripture is governed by the common law of

2. Interpretation of Scripture must be based on the understood in its proper and native Eucharistic sense, unless a plain and urgent reason compels the adoption of a figurative interpretation. The writers who have recorded the institution of the sacrament have given no hint that they wish to be understood figuratively. The solemn occasion—the Eucharist being the expression of the last will or testament of the Lord—forbids the use of figurative language (Gal 3 15). The fact that a statement of Scripture transcends our natural powers of comprehension does not justify us in giving it a figurative meaning. If this rationalistic principle were to be applied in explaining Scripture, we could not retain a single revealed doctrine. Besides, those who have adopted a figurative interpretation are not agreed where to locate the figure in the words of institution. Some claim that the word toûto, others that esti, others that to sôma mou contain a figure, while still others would take the institutional words in their proper sense, but understand the entire ordinance figuratively.

The eucharistic passages contain: (1) a statement fixing the time and occasion of the institution. It

3. Doctrinal Contents of the Eucharistic Passages was "in the night in which he was betrayed," immediately before the beginning of the passio magna of Christ, and in connection with the celebration of the Jewish Passover (Mt 26 17 ff). The ordinance which Christ instituted was to take the place of the ancient Passover (1 Cor 5 7, which text Luther aptly renders: "We, too, have a passover, which is Christ crucified for us"). Jewish custom at the time of Christ seems to have allowed some latitude as regards the time for eating the paschal lamb. Thus the difference between John (18 28; 19 42) and the synoptists is overcome. Our Lord was deeply stirred with thoughts of love and affection for His disciples at the time of the institution (13 1).

(2) An authoritative declaration of Christ, the God-man, fixing the constituent parts of the sacrament, and the essential features of the sacramental act (speciem actus). This declaration names:

(a) The elements of the sacrament, which are of two kinds: bread and wine (materia terrena), and the body and blood of the Lord (materia coelestis) (see Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., iv.34.363, quoted in Form. Conc. Sol. Decl., Art. VII, no. 14, 649). There is no law laid down as regards the quality, form, or quantity of the bread (leavened or unleavened, round or oblong, in large loaves, cakes, or in wafer form ready for immediate distribution). Likewise the color and quality of the wine is left undefined. The expression gennēma tēs ampelou, "fruit of the vine" (Mt 26 29), sanctions the use of any substance that has grown on the vine, has been pressed from grapes, and has the characteristics of the substance known as wine. That the wine used by the Lord at that season of the year and in accordance with Jewish custom was fermented wine, there can be no doubt (Hodge, Systematic Theol., III, 616). The use of unfermented wine is apt to introduce an element of uncertainty into the sacrament. The heavenly elements are defined thus: "My body, which is given for you," "my blood, which is shed for many." These terms signify the real, substantial, natural body of Christ, and His real, natural blood (Luther: "the true body and blood of our Lord"). Both the earthly and the heavenly elements are really present at the same time in every eucharistic act. To deny either the presence of real bread and wine at any stage during the eucharistic act, as the Roman doctrine of transubstantiation does (against 1 Cor 11 26,28), or the real presence of the true body and blood of Christ, as reformed teaching does, is not doing justice to Scripture.

(b) The relation of the elements to one another: In offering the physical elements to the disciples the Lord employs the locutio exhibitiva, common to every language of men: He names that which is not seen while giving that which is seen. ("Here are your spices," says the grocer delivering the package containing them.) The locutio exhibitiva, except when used by a jester or dishonest person, always states a fact. The bread in the Eucharist is the body of Christ, the wine, likewise, is the blood of Christ. The relation is expressed in 1 Cor 10 16,17 by koinōnia, "communion." This term is not the same as metochē, "participation," which would refer to the communicants (Plummer, HDB, III, 149). Koinōnia declares a communion of the bread with the body, of the wine with the blood, of Christ. It is impossible to define the mode and manner of this communion of the earthly with the heavenly elements. Such terms as "consubstantiation," "impanation," "invasion," are faulty attempts to define the undefinable. All we can assert is, that in a manner incomprehensible to us the body and blood of the Lord are in a sacramental union with the eucharistic bread and wine.

(c) The action required, viz. "take, eat"; "take, drink." These words refer to the distribution and reception of the sacramental elements. These are essential, the mode is not, unless one wishes to emphasize, e.g. by the breaking of the bread, the merely symbolical meaning of the entire ordinance. Accordingly, it is also immaterial whether the administrant place the elements into the hands of the communicant, who then conveys them to his mouth, or whether the administrant conveys the elements directly to the mouth of the communicant. The acts of distributing and receiving, however, extend to the entire sacramental substance, i.e. not the bread, or the wine, alone are distributed and received, but "in, with, and under the bread" the body, "in, with, and under the wine" the blood, of Christ. The eating and drinking in the Eucharist is of a peculiar kind. It differs from mere natural eating and drinking of common food, and from spiritual eating and drinking, which is a figurative expression signifying the believing appropriation of the Saviour's atoning work, and which can never be for judgment." In natural eating and drinking there would be only bread and wine, not the body and blood of the Lord; in spiritual eating and drinking there would be only the merits of the Redeemer, not bread and wine. In sacramental eating and drinking both the bread and the body, the wine and the blood, of Christ, are sacramentally received, the earthly elements in a natural, the heavenly in a supernatural, undefinable manner, both, however, orally, and both by every communicant. For, according to 1 Cor 11 29, also the unworthy communicant receives the Lord's body, and that for his judgment, "not discerning" it (AV).

(d) The end and aim of the ordinance: The Lord says: "This do in remembrance of me." Paul says: "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come." These words make the Eucharist an efficient means for strengthening the spiritual union of the disciples with the Lord until His second coming. They are a call for faith on the part of the communicants, and restrict admission to communion to the believing followers of the Lord. Worthy communicants are those who understand the meaning of Christ's sacrifice and hope for His return in glory. (Luther: "The sacrament is instituted for us Christians.") The duty of self-exploration enjoined upon communicants further emphasizes the purpose of this ordinance. Self-exploration embraces knowledge and acknowledgment of our sinful state, confidence in the ever-present forgiveness of God for Christ's sake, and a sincere purpose to forsake sin and grow in holiness. Accordingly, non-believers, morally irresponsible persons, and persons who lead offensive lives which they will not amend, cannot be admitted to communion (Mt 7 6). In 1 Cor 10 17 Paul names another purpose: the strengthening of the bonds of brotherly love and fellowship by means of communion. Hence, unity of faith and active Christian charity are required in those who are to commune together (Mt 5 23,24), and "close communion," not "open, or promiscuous communion" is in accord with the teaching of Scripture. In the absence of any fixed rule as to the frequency of a Christian's communing, the above reasons suffice to induce him to commune frequently ("as often as").

(3) An authoritative statement of Christ concerning the continued use of the sacrament (exercitium actus): "This do." This means (a) that the action of Christ is to be repeated, i.e., bread and wine should be blessed, distributed and received. The blessing is called the consecration and consists in the reciting of a prayer and the words of the institution. Consecration has no magical effects, it does not produce the sacramental union. On the other hand, it is not a mere meaningless ceremony, but a solemn declaration that in accordance with the will of the Lord, bread and wine are now being separated from their common use, to be devoted to the use which the Lord commanded. It is also a prayer to the Lord to be present in the sacrament; (b) that whenever disciples do as their Lord did, He will connect His body and blood with the earthly substances as He did at the first communion; (c) that besides the blessing of the elements, only the giving, or distribution, and the taking, or reception, of the sacramental elements are proper and essential parts of a sacramental action. A true sacramental action is complete only where these three acts concur: consecration, distribution, reception, and outside of these acts nothing that may be done with the elements possesses the nature of a sacrament or a sacramental action. Offering the consecrated wafer for adoration is no part of the sacrament, but is a form of idolatry (artolatry), because there is no sacramental union except in the act of distributing and receiving the consecrated elements. The withdrawal of the cup from the lay communicants is an unwarranted mutilation of the sacrament (Mt 26 27; Mk 14 23). But the grossest perversion of the sacrament, and a standing reproach to the completeness of the atoning sacrifice of the Lord is the offering up of the consecrated elements as an unbloody sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead, which is being done in the Rom mass (He 10 14,18).

III. Difficulties.—"How can these things be?" This question might be raised against every doctrine of Scripture. The union of the 1. Question natures in the God-man, the imputation of His merit to the believer, the quickening power of the word of Divine grace, the resurrection of the dead, etc, can all be subjected to the same questioning.

"Has faith no place in this sacrament?" Faith does not create, nor help to create the sacrament, neither the administrant's nor the communicant's faith. The sacrament is fully constituted in all its parts by the institutional act of the Lord and by

2. Place of Faith His command to continue the observance of it. Man's faith cannot make, man's unbelief cannot unmake, an ordinance of God. But faith is necessary in order that a communicant may receive the blessings offered in the Eucharist, and testify to his believing relation to the Lord and to his Christian fellowship with the brethren. The sacrament bestows no blessing ex opere operato, i.e. by the mere mechanical performance of the physical act.

"Are the words of the institution part of the sacred text?" Up to the age of Paulus, they were universally regarded so, and the critical labors of Briggs, P. Gardner, Grafe, Immer, Jülicher, etc, which can readily be explained by the theological position of these men, lack unity of result and are offset by the labors of Scrivener, Schultzen, R. A. Hoffman, Blass, Beyschlag, etc. Christianity as yet sees no reason for discarding the words of the institution and for discontinuing the Eucharist as a Divine ordinance.

  1. Date
  2. Doctrinal
  3. Tradition
- II. THE PERPETUATION OF THE LAST SUPPER
- III. PRACTICE OF THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN
- IV. THE MEANING AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THE LOVE FEAST

LITERATURE

The interest of this denomination in the Lord's Supper as related to the Passover consists in two points: (1) that the "Lord's Supper" was not the Jewish Passover, but was eaten the evening before the Jewish feast; and (2) that this "Last Supper" was intended to be perpetuated. This is perpetuated by the Church of the Brethren under the name of "Love Feast" (see AGAPE).

I. The Last Supper Was Not the Jewish Passover.—John gives five distinct intimations of the date:

(1) "Now before the feast of the pass-over" (Ἰσὺς δὲ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα, Ἰ'ὸ δὲ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα; Jn 13 1). This shows that the washing of the disciples' feet, and the discourses at the Last Supper were before the Passover.

(2) "Buy what things we have need of for the feast" (ἀγοράσων ὧν χρειαῖν ἔχουσιν εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, ἀγόρασον ἵνα χρειαῖν ἔχουσιν εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν; 13 29). This shows that the Supper (δῆπνον, deipnon) was not the Passover feast (ἑορτήν, heortēn).

(3) "They lead Jesus therefore from Caiaphas into the Praetorium; and it was early; and they themselves entered not into the Praetorium, that they might not be defiled, but might eat the passover" (ἵνα φάγωσιν τὸ πάσχα, ἵνα φάγωσιν τὸ πάσχα; Jn 18 28). This was after the Supper, early on the day of crucifixion, before the Passover.

(4) "Now it was the Preparation of the passover: it was about the sixth hour" (ἦν δὲ παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα, ἔτι δὲ παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα; Jn 19 14). This again shows conclusively that the Passover was not yet eaten. Jesus is before Pilate; it is the day of the crucifixion, and after the Last Supper.

(5) "The Jews therefore, because it was the Preparation, that the bodies should not remain on the cross upon the sabbath (for the day of that sabbath was a high day)," ver 31, etc. Here we have again a reference to the Preparation (παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα, παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα), and also to the Sabbath which, in this case was a "high day" (ἦν γὰρ μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκεῖνου τοῦ σαββάτου, ἐν ᾧ γὰρ μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκεῖνου τοῦ σαββάτου). This shows that the Passover was eaten on Friday evening after sunset on the 15th of Nisan at the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath. Whenever the Passover fell upon the Sabbath, that Sabbath was a "high day."

Christ is our Passover: died at the time the Passover lamb was slain, hence after the Last Supper. (1) Christ died at the time the Passover lamb was slain on Friday afternoon, the 14th of Nisan, and thus became Our Passover (1 Cor 5 7).

"For our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ." (2) Jesus, the "Lamb of God" (Jn 1 29) corresponds to the Passover lamb (Ex 12 3). "Without blemish" (Ex 12 5) = Jesus, "who did no sin" (1 Pet 2 22-24). The blood of a lamb sprinkled upon houses (Ex 12 7.13) corresponds to salvation by the blood of Jesus (1 Jn 1 7-9). (3) Jesus arose the third day and became "the first-fruits of them that are asleep" (1 Cor 15 4.20.23). The resurrection was on the first day of the week. The sheaf, or first-fruits, was gathered on the 16th of Nisan. Therefore Jesus must have died on Friday the 14th of Nisan, when the Passover lamb was slain; hence after the Last Supper.

All the early traditions, both Jewish and Christian, agree that Jesus was crucified on the day of Preparation of the Passover, and they dis-

3. Tradition distinguish between the Passover and the Last Supper which was eaten the evening before the Jewish feast.

II. The Perpetuation of the Last Supper.—(1) Since the Last Supper was a new institution, there is no more reason for perpetuating one part than another. It is a unit, and each event of that night has its meaning and place. (2) Jesus commanded the disciples to perpetuate feet-washing (see WASHING OF FEET) (Jn 13 14 15 17), and likewise He commanded the Eucharist to be perpetuated, as a memorial of Him (1 Cor 11 24 25). Why not the Agape? (3) The Agape was perpetuated by the apostles and disciples. They certainly understood Jesus to mean that the entire services of the Last Supper should be perpetuated, else they would not have done so.

III. Practice of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkers).—The "Love Feast" commemorates Jesus' Last Supper with His disciples. These Love Feasts are held once or twice each year, always in the evening, by each local church or congregation. Preparatory services on "self-examination" (1 Cor 11 28) precede the ordinances. The church pews are converted into tables. The Supper (deipnon, deipnon) is made ready beforehand by the deacons and deaconesses. The devotional exercises aim to accomplish special consecration, confession, and reconciliation. Before the eating of the Supper, Jn 13 1-17 is read and explained, whereupon the brethren proceed to wash one another's feet, and the sisters likewise by themselves. All tarry one for another (1 Cor 11 33) until they are ready for the Supper. The officiating elder then calls upon someone to offer prayer for the meal, which is then eaten together. Another prayer of thanksgiving is offered at the close of the meal. After the meal, the officiating elder calls upon one to read the story of Christ's sufferings (Isa 53, or Jn 19). After a short explanation of the meaning of the symbol, the communicants rise while the officiating elder gives thanks for the bread. He then turns to his brother at his right and breaks a piece of the unleavened bread for him with the words, "My beloved brother, the bread which we break is the communion of the body of Christ" (see 1 Cor 10 16). The brethren then break the bread one to the other, with these words. Likewise the sisters in the same manner. Again the congregation rises while the officiating elder gives thanks for the cup, which is then passed by one to the other with the words "Beloved brother [or sister], the cup of the NT is the communion of the blood of Christ" (1 Cor 10 16). This is followed by prayers of praise and thanksgiving, then a hymn (Mt 26 30) and a benediction.

IV. The Meaning and Significance of the Love Feast.—All these ordinances or symbols signify some fundamental virtue in the Christian life. We are commanded to follow our Master who is the Way and the Truth. But these symbols have a real significance, apart from merely "following" or "obeying" the Lord's command. (1) Feet-washing symbolized humility and service, and also the partial cleansing which all Christians need. (2) The Agape signifies the bread-and-water covenant of brotherhood and peace. It is not only the symbol of true Christian fellowship, but is productive of such fellowship. It is also symbolic of the "Marriage Supper of the Lamb," which is supremely a symbol of joy. (3) The Eucharist: (a) The broken bread represents the "body of Christ" (1 Cor 10 16) "which is broken for you" (1 Cor 11 24 AV); hence the symbol of sacrifice. It is a memorial of Christ's sufferings, and a consecration to suffer with Him. It means also feeding on Christ, whose flesh we must eat (Jn 6 35.51.53.54). (b) The cup represents the blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16; Jn 6 53.54). It is the blood covenant that symbolizes the unity of man with God (Jn 17 21). Jesus is the vine, we are the branches (Jn 15). The same mind, spirit, life and love which are in God and Christ are to be in us.

LOT, lot:

I. Personality.—The man who bore the name Lot (לֹט, lōt; לוֹט, Lōt) is mentioned for the first time in Gen 11 27, at the beginning of that section of Gen which is entitled "the generations of Terah." After Terah's 3 sons are named, it is added that the third of these, Haran, begat Lot.

The reason for thus singling out but one of the grandsons of Terah appears in the next verse, where we are told that "Haran died before his father Terah in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees." For that period in the life of this family, therefore, which begins with the migration from Ur, L. represents his father's branch of the family (ver 31). It is hardly probable that the relation between Abraham and L. would have been what it was, had not Haran died; but be this as it may, we read this introduction of L. into the genealogy of Terah as an anticipation of the story to which it furnishes an introduction, and in which L. is destined to play an important part.

The sections of that story in which L. appears are: in ch 11, the migration from Ur to Haran; in ch 12, Abraham's wanderings; in ch 13, the separation of Abraham and L.; in ch 14, the campaign of the eastern kings against Sodom and Abraham's recovery of the captives; and in ch 19, the destruction of Sodom.

In Gen 14 14.16 L. is termed the "brother" of Abraham; but that this does not represent a variant tradition is proved by reference to ver 12 of the same chapter (ascribed to "an independent source") and to 13 8 (ascribed to J; cf 11 28 J).

II. Career.—L.'s life, as the scanty references to him permit us to reconstruct it, falls into four periods. Of the first period—that

1. First Period previous to the migration from Haran—we know nothing save L.'s birth in Ur, the death of his father there, the marriage of his sister Milcah to his uncle Nahor (of another sister, Iscah, we learn only the name), and the journey to Haran in company with Terah, Abraham and Sarah. The fact that Sarah's childlessness and Haran's death are the only two circumstances related of the family history, may serve to explain why L. went with Abraham instead of staying with Nahor. A childless uncle and a fatherless nephew may well have remained together with the idea that, even if there was no formal adoption, the nephew might become his uncle's heir. Certainly, the promise of a numberless seed, so often repeated to the patriarchs, comes first to Abraham immediately after L. has separated from him (see Gen 13 6-18).

In the second period of L.'s life, we find him the companion of Abraham on his journeys from Mesopotamia to Canaan, through Canaan

2. Second Period to Egypt, and back again to the neighborhood of Beth-el. His position is subordinate, for his uncle is head of the family, and oriental custom is uniform and rigorous in the matter of family rule. Hence the use of the singular number throughout the narrative. What Abraham did, his whole "clan" did. Yet L.'s position was as nearly independent as these patriarchal conditions admit. When the story reaches the point where it is necessary to mention this fact, the narrator explains, first, the generosity with which Abraham treated his nephew, in permitting him to have "flocks, and herds, and tents" of his own, a quasi-independent economy, and second, that disproportion between their collective possessions and the land's resources which made separation inevitable. Up to this point the only mention of L. during this period of wandering is contained in 13 1, in the words "and Lot with him." And even here the words are useless (because stating a fact perfectly presumable here as elsewhere), except as they prepare the reader for the story of the separation that is immediately to follow.

That story introduces the third period of Lot's career, that of his residence in the Kikkār (RV "Plain," RVm "Circle") and in Sodom.

3. Third Period To the fundamental cause of separation, as above stated, the author adds the two circumstances which contributed to produce the result, namely, first, the strife that arose between Abraham's herdsmen and L.'s herdsmen, and, second, the presence in the same country of others—the Canaanites and Perizzites—thus reminding his readers that it was no vacant land, through which they might spread themselves absolutely at will and so counteract the operation of the principal cause and the contributory cause already set forth.

With a magnanimity that must have seemed even greater to minds accustomed to patriarchal authority than it seems to us, and that was in fact much more remarkable than it would be here and now, Abraham offers to his nephew the choice of the land—from the nomad's point of view. In the

"we are brethren" (ver 8), the whole force of the scene is crystallized. L., who believes himself to have chosen the better part, is thereupon traced in his nomadic progress as far as Sodom, and the reader leaves him for a time face to face with a city whose men "were wicked and sinners against Jeh exceedingly," while the narrative moves on with Abraham through that fresh scene of revelation which presented to this man of magnanimity a Divine deed to all the land, and to this man, now left without an heir from among his own kindred (cf 15 2.3), a Divine pledge of innumerable offspring.

L. returns for a moment to our view as the main-spring of Abraham's motions in the campaign of ch 14. We are expressly told that it was "when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive," that he "led forth his trained men . . . and pursued." On the one hand we hear that L. now "dwelt in Sodom," having abandoned the life in tents that he had led since Mesopotamian days, and on the other hand we find in him a foil to the energetic, decisive and successful figure of his uncle—for L. plays a sorry rôle, bracketed always with "the women and the goods."

This period of his life ends with the annihilation of his chosen home, his wealth, his companions, and all that was his save two daughters, who, it would seem, might better have perished with the rest. Ch 19, coming immediately after the intercession of Abraham for Sodom that poignantly impresses on the reader's mind the wickedness of L.'s environment, exhibits to us the man himself in his surroundings, as they have affected him through well-nigh a score of years (cf 12 4; 17 1). What we see is a man who means well (courtesy, ver 1; hospitality, vs 2.3.6-8; natural shame, ver 7; loyalty, ver 14; and gratitude, ver 19), but who is hopelessly bound up with the moral life of the city through his family connections—alliances that have pulled him down rather than elevated others (vs 9.14.26.31-35). The language of 2 Pet 2 7.8 reminds us that L. was, even at this time of his life, a "righteous" man. Viewed as a part of his environment (the writer has been speaking of Sodom, ver 6), L. was certainly entitled to be called a "righteous" man, and the term fits the implications of Gen 18 23-32. Moreover, Gen 19 itself shows L. "vexed . . . with their lawless deeds" and "sore distressed by the lascivious life of the wicked" (cf vs 3.7.8.14). Yet the contrast with Abraham is always present in the reader's mind, so that the most lasting impressions are made by L.'s selfishness, worldliness, vacillation and cowardice, not to mention the moral effect made by the closing scene of his life (vs 30-38).

The fourth period of L.'s career is of uncertain duration. Upon the destruction of Sodom he

4. Fourth Period dwelt at first in Zoar, the "little" city, spared as a convenient refuge for him and his; but at some time unspecified, he "went up out of Zoar," for "he feared to dwell in Zoar"—why, we cannot say. This fear was greater than even the evidently great fear he entertained of dwelling in "the mountain" (ver 19). In this mountain-country of rocks and caves (Driver in HDB, art. "Lot," cites Buckingham, Travels in Syria, 61-63, 87, as authority for the statement that people still live in caves in this region), L. and his two remaining daughters dwell; and the biography of this companion of "the friend of God" ends in a scene of incest, which supplies the logical epilogue to a drama of progressive moral deterioration. This bestial cave-man of Gen 19 is the "brother" of Abraham, but he has reached this goal because his path had led down from Beth-el to Sodom.

The origin of the two neighboring and kindred nations, Moab and Ammon, is by the Heb tradition traced thus to Lot and his daughters.

III. Place in Later Literature.—In the Bible, L. finds mention only as the father of Moab and Ammon (Dt 2 9.19; Ps 83 8), and in the passage in 2 Pet already noticed; and, besides these places, in Lk 17 28-32. Here L. represents the central figure in the destruction of Sodom, as Noah in the flood in the preceding context (cf the association of these two characters in 2 Pet and the Koran). His deliverance is mentioned, the haste and narrowness of that escape is implied, and his wife's fate is recalled. In Jewish and Mohammedan lore (including many passages in the Koran itself), L. is a personage of importance, about whom details are told which fancy has added to the sober traditions of old Israel. But particularly for Mohammed there was point of attachment in L.'s career, offered in Gen 19 7.14. Like Mohammed to the men of wicked Mecca, L. becomes a preacher of righteousness and a messenger of judgment to the men of wicked Sodom. He is one of the line of apostles, sent to reveal God's will and purpose to his contemporaries.

IV. Critical Theories about the Figure of Lot.—The common view of those who deny the historical reality of L. is that this name simply stands for the ethnic group, Moab and Ammon. Wellhausen, e.g., expressly calls "Lot" a national name (Volksname). As to what is told of him in Gen he remarks: "Were it not for the remarkable depression in which the Dead Sea lies, Sodom and Gomorrah would not have perished; were it not for the little flat tongue of land that reaches out into the swamp from the S.E., Lot would have fled at once to the mountains of his sons, Moab and Ammon, and not have made the détour by Zoar, which merely serves the purpose of explaining why this corner is excepted from 'the overthrow' to the territory of which it really belongs" (Prolegomena f. 323). Meyer confesses that nothing can be made of L. because "any characteristic feature that might furnish a point of attachment is entirely lacking." The first of the families of the Horites of Seir was named Lotan (Gen 36 20.22), and this writer believes it "probable that this name is derived from Lot; but that Lot was ever a tribal name (Stammname) follows neither from this fact (rather the contrary) nor from the designation of Moab and the benē 'Ammōn as 'Sons of Lot' (Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, 311; cf 261, 339). If "Horite" was understood as "cave-dweller," the story in Gen 19 30 might be adduced in support of this combination. But the most recent line of reasoning concerning these patriarchal figures makes their names "neither Divine names nor tribal names, whether in actual use or regarded as such, but rather simple personal names like Tom, Dick and Harry. . . . Typical names they became . . . so that . . . Israel's story-tellers would connect the name of L. with the overthrow of the cities" (Gressmann, art. in ZATW, 1910). These names were chosen just because "they were very common at the time when the narratives were stamped into types"; later they became unfashionable, but the story-tellers held fast to the old names. "One sees from this at once into how ancient a time the proper names Abraham and Lot must reach, and understands therefore the more easily how they could be changed into tribal ancestors." It does not require the cautions, uttered by writers of this way of thinking, against regarding their views as a return to the old historical view of the patriarchs, to remind us that, in spite of all that may be said to the contrary, the present trend of thought among the most radical critics of the Genesis-traditions is much more favorable to that conservative historical view than were the opinions which they have overthrown. So that it may justly be asserted, as Gressmann writes: "Confidence in tradition is in any case on the rise."

Lot's Wife: This woman, unknown by name, figures in the narrative of Lot that relates his escape from Sodom. She is mentioned in Gen 19 only in vs 15-17, where she is commanded to flee from the doomed city with her husband and daughters, and is laid hold upon by the angelic visitors in their effort to hasten the slow departure; and in ver 26, where she alone of the four fugitives disobeys the warning, looks back, and becomes a "pillar of salt." This disobedience, with the moral state it implied and the judgment it entailed, is held up as an example by Christ in Lk 17 32. In the Scriptures this is all that is said of a person and event that furnished the basis for a great deal of speculation. Jos (Ant, I, xi, 4) adds to the statement derived from Gen, "She was changed into a pillar of salt," the words, "for I visited it and it still remains even now" (see also Wisd 10 7).

Among Christian writers contemporary with and subsequent to Jos, as well as among the Jews themselves and other Orientals, the same assertion is found, and down to recent times travelers have reported the persistence of such a "pillar of salt," either on the testimony of natives or as eyewitnesses. The question of the origin and nature of these "pillars" is a part of the larger question of Sodom and its neighborhood (see SALT; SIDDIM; SLIME); for that no one particular "pillar" has persisted through the centuries may be regarded as certain; nor if it had, would the identification of Lot's wife with it and with it alone be ascertainable. This is just an early, persistent and notable case of that "identification" of Bib. sites which prevails all over the Holy Land. It is to be classed with the myth- and legend-building turn of mind in simple peoples, which has e.g. embroidered upon this OT account of the destruction of Sodom such marvelous details and embellishments.

The principal thing to observe is the vagueness and the simplicity of the story in Gen. For it does not necessarily imply the "metamorphosis" popularly attributed to it, in the strict sense of that word. And it lacks, even in a narrative like this, where the temptation would be greatest, all indications of that "popular archaeology" or curiosity, which, according to some critics, is alleged to have furnished the original motive for the invention of the patriarchal narratives. "She became a pillar of salt," and "Remember Lot's wife": this is the extent of the Bib. allusions. All the rest is comment, or legend, or guess, or "science."

LOVE, luv (אָהֶבָה, 'ahēbhā, noun; φιλέω, philēō, ἀγαπάω, agapāō, vb.; ἀγάπη, agapē, noun): Love to both God and man is fundamental to true religion, whether as expressed in the OT or the NT. Jesus Himself declared that all the law and the prophets hang upon love (Mt 22 40; Mk 12 28-34). Paul, in his matchless ode on love (1 Cor 13), makes it the greatest of the graces of the Christian life—greater than speaking with tongues, or the gift of prophecy, or the possession of a faith of superior excellence; for without love all these gifts and graces, desirable and useful as they are in themselves, are as nothing, certainly of no permanent value in the sight of God. Not that either Jesus or Paul underestimates the faith from which all the graces proceed, for this grace is recognized as fundamental in all God's dealings with man and man's dealings with God (Jn 6 28 f; He 11 6); but both alike count that faith as but idle and worthless belief that does not manifest itself in love to both God and man. As love is the highest expression of God and His relation to mankind, so it must be the highest expression of man's relation to his Maker and to his fellow-man.

I. Definition.—While the Heb and Gr words for "love" have various shades and intensities of meaning, they may be summed up in some such definition as this: Love, whether used of God or man, is an earnest and anxious desire for, and an active and beneficent interest in, the well-being of the one loved. Different degrees and manifestations of this affection are recognized in the Scriptures according to the circumstances and relations of life, e.g. the expression of love as between husband and wife, parent and child, brethren according to the flesh, and according to grace; between friend and enemy, and, finally, between God and man. It must not be overlooked, however, that the fundamental idea of love as expressed in the definition of it is never absent in any one of these relations of life, even though the manifestation thereof may differ according to the circumstances and relations. Christ's interview with the apostle Peter on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 21 15-18) sets before us in a most beautiful way the different shades of meaning as found in the NT words φίλω, φιλέω, and ἀγαπάω, agapāō. In the question of Christ, "Lovest thou me more than these?" the Gr vb. ἀγαπᾷς, agapās, denotes the highest, most perfect kind of love (Lat diligere), implying a clear determination of will and judgment, and belonging particularly to the sphere of Divine revelation. In his answer Peter substitutes the word φιλῶ, philō, which means the natural human affection, with its strong feeling, or sentiment, and is never used in Scripture language to designate man's love to God. While the answer of Peter, then, claims only an inferior kind of love, as compared to the one contained in Christ's question, he nevertheless is confident of possessing at least such love for his Lord.

II. The Love of God.—First in the consideration of the subject of "love" comes the love of God—He who is love, and from whom all love is derived. The love of God is that part of His nature—indeed His whole nature, for "God is love"—which leads Him to express Himself in terms of endearment toward His creatures, and actively to manifest that interest and affection in acts of loving care and self-sacrifice in behalf of the objects of His love. God is "love" (1 Jn 4 8.16) just as truly as He is "light" (1 5), "truth" (1 6), and "spirit" (Jn 4 24). Spirit and light are expressions of His essential nature; love is the expression of His personality corresponding to His nature. God not merely loves, but is love; it is His very nature, and He imparts this nature to be the sphere in which His children dwell, for "he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him" (1 Jn 4 16). Christianity is the only religion that sets forth the Supreme Being as Love. In heathen religions He is set forth as an angry being and in constant need of appeasing.

The object of God's love is first and foremost His own Son, Jesus Christ (Mt 3 17; 17 5; Lk 20 13; Jn 17 24). The Son shares

1. Objects of God's Love the love of the Father in a unique sense; He is "my chosen, in whom my soul delighteth" (Isa 42 1). There exists an eternal affection between the Son and the Father—the Son is the original and eternal object of the Father's love (Jn 17 24). If God's love is eternal it must have an eternal object, hence Christ is an eternal being.

God loves the believer in His Son with a special love. Those who are united by faith and love to Jesus Christ are, in a different sense from those who are not thus united, the special objects of God's love. Said Jesus, thou "lovestst them, even as thou lovedst me" (Jn 17 23). Christ is referring to the fact that, just as the disciples had received the same treatment from the world that He had received, so they had received of the Father the same love that He Himself had received. They were not on the outskirts of God's love, but in the very center of it. "For the father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me" (Jn 16 27). Here φιλέω is used for love, indicating the fatherly affection of God for the believer in Christ, His Son. This is love in a more intense form than that spoken of for the world (Jn 3 16).

God loves the world (Jn 3 16; cf 1 Tim 2 4; 2 Pet 3 9). This is a wonderful truth when we realize what a world this is—a world of sin and corruption. This was a startling truth for Nicodemus to learn, who conceived of God as loving only the Jewish nation. To him, in his narrow exclusivism, the announcement of the fact that God loved the whole world of men was startling. God loves the world of sinners lost and ruined by the fall. Yet it is this world, "weak," "ungodly," "without strength," "sinners" (Rom 5 6-8), "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph 2 1 AV), and unrighteous, that God so loved that He gave His only begotten Son in order to redeem it. The genesis of man's salvation lies in the love and mercy of God (Eph 2 4 f). But love is more than mercy or compassion; it is active and identifies itself with its object. The love of the heavenly Father over the return of His wandering children is beautifully set forth in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). Nor should the fact be overlooked that God loves not only the whole world, but each individual in it; it is a special as well as a general love (Jn 3 16, "whosoever"; Gal 2 20, "loved me, and gave himself up for me").

God's love is manifested by providing for the physical, mental, moral and spiritual needs of His people (Isa 48 14.20.21; 62 9-12;

2. Manifestations of God's Love 63 3.12). In these Scriptures God is seen manifesting His power in behalf of His people in the time of their wilderness journeying and their captivity.

He led them, fed and clothed them, guided them and protected them from all their enemies. His love was again shown in feeling with His people, their sorrows and afflictions (Isa 63 9); He suffered in their affliction, their interests were His; He was not their adversary but their friend, even though it might have seemed to them as if He either had brought on them their suffering or did not care about it. Nor did He ever forget them for a moment during all their trials. They thought He did; they said, "God hath forgotten us," "He hath forgotten to be gracious"; but no; a mother might forget her child 'hat she should not have compassion on it, but God would never forget His people. How could He? Had He not graven them upon the palms of His hands (Isa 49 15 f)? Rather than His love being absent in the chastisement of His people, the chastisement itself was often a proof of the presence of the Divine love, "for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (He 12 6-11). Loving reproof and chastisement are necessary oftentimes for growth in holiness and righteousness. Our redemption from sin is to be attributed to God's wondrous love; "Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption; for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back" (Isa 38 17; cf Ps 50 21; 90 8). Eph 2 4 f sets forth in a wonderful way how our entire salvation springs forth from the mercy and love of God; "But God, being rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ," etc. It is because of the love of the Father that we are granted a place in the heavenly kingdom (Eph 2 6-8). But the supreme manifestation of the love of God, as set forth in the Scripture, is that expressed in the gift of His only-begotten Son to die for the sins of the world (Jn 3 16; Rom 5 6-8; 1 Jn 4 9 f), and through whom the sinful and sinning but repentant sons of men are taken into the family of God, and receive the adoption of sons (1 Jn 3 1 f; Gal 4 4-6). From this wonderful love of God in Christ Jesus nothing in heaven or earth or hell, created or uncreated or to be created, shall be able to separate us (Rom 8 37 f).

III. The Love of Man.—Whatever love there is in man, whether it be toward God or toward his fellow-

1. Source of Man's Love man, has its source in God—"Love is of God; and every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love" (1 Jn 4 7 f); "We love, because he first loved us" (1 Jn 4 19). Trench, in speaking of agapē, says it is a word born within the bosom of revealed religion. Heathen writers do not use it at all, their nearest approach to it being philanthropia or philadelphia—the love between those of the same blood. Love in the heart of man is the offspring of the love of God. Only the regenerated heart can truly love as God loves; to this higher form of love the unregenerate can lay no claim (1 Jn 4 7, 19, 21; 2 7-11; 3 10; 4 11 f). The regenerate man is able to see his fellow-man as God sees him, value him as God values him, not so much because of what he is by reason of his sin and unloveliness, but because of what, through Christ, he may become; he sees man's intrinsic worth and possibility in Christ (2 Cor 5 14-17). This love is also created in the heart of man by the Holy Ghost (Rom 5 5), and is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5 22). It is also stimulated by the example of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, more than anyone else, manifested to the world the spirit and nature of true love (Jn 13 34; 15 12; Gal 2 20; Eph 5 25-27; 1 Jn 4 9 f).

God must be the first and supreme object of man's love; He must be loved with all the heart,

2. Objects of Man's Love mind, soul and strength (Mt 22 37 f; Mk 12 29-34). In this last passage the exhortation to supreme love to God is connected with the doctrine of the unity of God (Dt 6 4 f)—inasmuch as the Divine Being is one and indivisible, so must our love to Him be undivided. Our love to God is shown in the keeping of His commandments (Ex 20 6; 1 Jn 5 3; 2 Jn ver 6). Love is here set forth as more than a mere affection or sentiment; it is something that manifests itself, not only in obedience to known Divine commands, but also in a protecting and defence of them, and a seeking to know more and more of the will of God in order to express love for God in further obedience (cf Dt 10 12). Those who love God will hate evil and all forms of worldliness, as expressed in the avoidance of the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh and the pride of life (Ps 97 10; 1 Jn 2 15-17). Whatever there may be in his surroundings that would draw the soul away from God and righteousness, that the child of God will avoid. Christ, being God, also claims the first place in our affections. He is to be chosen before father or mother, parent or child, brother or sister, or friend (Mt 10 35-38; Lk 14 26). The word "hate" in these passages does not mean to hate in the sense in which we use the word today. It is used in the sense in which Jacob is said to have "hated" Leah (Gen 29 31), that is, he loved her less than Rachel; "He loved also Rachel more than Leah" (ver 30). To love Christ supremely is the test of true discipleship (Lk 14 26), and is an unfailing mark of the elect (1 Pet 1 8). We prove that we are really God's children by thus loving His Son (Jn 8 42). Absence of such love means, finally, eternal separation (1 Cor 16 22).

Man must love his fellow-man also. Love for the brotherhood is a natural consequence of the love of the fatherhood; for "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (1 Jn 3 10). For a man to say "I love God" and yet hate his fellow-man is to brand himself as "a liar" (4 20); "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen" (ver 20); he that loveth God will love his brother also (ver 21). The degree in which we are to love our fellow-man is "as thyself" (Mt 22 39), according to the strict observance of the law. Christ set before His followers a much higher example than that, however. According to the teaching of Jesus we are to supersede this standard: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (Jn 13 34). The exhibition of love of this character toward our fellow-man is the badge of true discipleship. It may be called the sum total of our duty toward our fellow-man, for "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor: love therefore is the fulfilment of the law"; "for he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law" (Rom 13 8, 10). The qualities which should characterize the love which we are to manifest toward our fellow-men are beautifully set forth in 1 Cor 13. It is patient and without envy; it is not proud or self-elated, neither does it behave discourteously; it does not cherish evil, but keeps good account of the good; it rejoices not at the downfall of an enemy or competitor, but gladly hails his success; it is hopeful, trustful and forbearing—for such there is no law, for they need none; they have fulfilled the law.

Nor should it be overlooked that Our Lord commanded His children to love their enemies, those who spoke evil of them, and despitefully used them (Mt 5 43-48). They were not to render evil for evil, but, contrariwise, blessing. The love of the disciple of Christ must manifest itself in supplying the necessities, not of our friends only (1 Jn 3 16-18), but also of our enemies (Rom 12 20 f).

Our love should be "without hypocrisy" (Rom 12 9); there should be no pretence about it; it should not be a thing of mere word or tongue, but a real experience manifesting itself in deed and truth (1 Jn 3 18). True love will find its expression in service to man: "Through love be servants one to another" (Gal 5 13). What more wonderful illustration can be found of ministering love than that set forth by Our Lord in the ministry of foot-washing as found in Jn 13? Love bears the infirmities of the weak, does not please itself, but seeks the welfare of others (Rom 15 1-3; Phil 2 21; Gal 6 2; 1 Cor 10 24); it surrenders things which may be innocent in themselves but which nevertheless may become a stumbling-block to others (Rom 14 15, 21); it gladly forgives injuries (Eph 4 32), and gives the place of honor to another (Rom 12 10). What, then, is more vital than to possess such love? It is the fulfilment of the royal law (Jas 2 8), and is to be put above everything else (Col 3 14); it is the binder that holds all the other graces of the Christian life in place (Col 3 14); by the possession of such love we know that we have passed from death unto life (1 Jn 3 14), and it is the supreme test of our abiding in God and God in us (1 Jn 4 12, 16).

LOVE-FEAST, luv'fēst. See AGAPE.

LOVELY, luv'li (אהבה, 'āhabh, אהבה, 'āhēbh; προσφιλής, prospihilēs): "Lovely" occurs only 4 t. In 2 S 1 23 it is the tr of 'āhēbh, "to be loved" ("Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant [AVm "sweet"] in their lives"), where it seems to mean "loving" or "lovable." Two other words are so tr'd in the OT: māhādāh, "desire," a "desirable thing" (Cant 5 16, "He is altogether lovely," that is, "lovable," "to be desired," lit. "all of him lovable-ness," or "desirableness"); āghābhīm "loves," or "charms" (Ezk 33 32, "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song," AVm "a song of loves," RVm "a love-song"; in ver 31 the same word is tr'd "much love," AVm "They make loves or jests"); in Phil 4 8 we have prospihilēs, "very lovely," or "lovable," "whatsoever things are lovely."

W. L. WALKER

LOVER, luv'er (אהבה, 'āhēbh, אהבה, 'āhēbh): In the OT 'āhēbh, from 'āhēbh, "to love," is sometimes "lover" in the sense of "friend," in the older Eng. sense of the word (1 K 5 1, "Hiram was ever a lover of David"; Ps 38 11; 88 18; Lam 1 2); more frequently it has the meaning of "lover" in the special sense, sometimes in the evil sense of the word (Jer 22 20.22; 30 14; Ezk 16 33.36 f, etc; Hos 2 5.7.10, etc); āghabh, "to love" (Jer 4 30), rēa, "companion" (Jer 3 1), and āghābhīm, "loves" (Hos 8 9), are also tr'd "lovers" in this sense.

In the NT the simple word "lover" does not occur, but we have various compound words, philōtheos "lover of God" (2 Tim 3 4); philagathos, "lover of good," and philōzenos, "lover of hospitality" (Tit 1 8); philauros, "lover of self" (2 Tim 3 2); philōdonos, "lover of pleasure" (2 Tim 3 4).

In RV we have, for "a lover of hospitality" (Tit 1 8), "given to"; for "covetous" (Lk 16 14; 2 Tim 3 2), "lovers of money"; for "not covetous" (1 Tim 3 3), "no lover of money"; for "despisers of them that are good" (2 Tim 3 3), "no lovers of good."

LOVES, luvz (Ps 45 1, title). See PSALMS.

LOVINGKINDNESS, luv-ing-kind'nes (חסד, hesedh): "Lovingkindness" in AV always represents this word (30 t), but of hesedh there are many other renderings, e.g. "mercy" (frequently), "kindness" (38), "goodness" (12). The word is derived from hāsadh, meaning, perhaps, "to bend or bow oneself," "to incline oneself"; hence "to be gracious or merciful." ERV has not many changes, but in ARV "lovingkindness" is invariably employed when hesedh is used of God, and, as a rule, "kindness" when it is used of man, as in Gen 21 23; Jgs 1 24 (AV "mercy," RV "deal kindly"); Ruth 3 10; 2 Ch 32 32; 35 26 (AV "goodness," m "Heb kindness," RV "good deeds"); Job 6 14, etc. Of the uses of the word as on man's part toward God, the only occurrences are: Jer 2 2, "I remember for thee the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals," etc; Hos 6 4.6, "Your goodness [RVm "or kindness"] is as a morning cloud," "I desire goodness [AV "mercy," RVm "kindness"], and not sacrifice," which last passage may denote kindness as toward man.

When used of God hesedh denotes, in general, "the Divine Love condescending to His creatures, more esp. to sinners, in unmerited kindness" (Delitzsch). It is frequently associated with forgiveness, and is practically equivalent to "mercy" or "mercifulness" (Ex 20 6), "showing lovingkindness [ERV "mercy"] unto thousands of them that love me"; 34 6 f,

"slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness [ERV "plenteous in mercy"]"; [ver 7] "keeping lovingkindness [ERV "mercy"] for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (cf Nu 14 18); Mic 7 18, "He retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in lovingkindness" (ERV "mercy"). This quality in Jeh was one by which He sought to bind His people to Himself. It is greatly magnified in the OT, highly extolled and gloried in, in many of the psalms (Ps 136 has the constant refrain, "For his lovingkindness endureth forever"). In Dt 7 12 it is associated with the covenant, and in 2 S 7 15 with the covenant with David (cf Isa 55 3, etc). It was something that could always be relied on.

Being such an essential and distinctive quality of God, the prophets taught that it should also characterize His people. It is part of the Divine requirement in Mic 6 8, "to love kindness" (cf Zec 7 9, "Show kindness and compassion every man to his brother"). The want of it in the nation was a cause of Jeh's controversy with them, e.g. Hos 4 1, "There is no truth, nor goodness [hesedh] [AV and ERV "mercy"], nor knowledge of God in the land"; 12 6, "Therefore turn thou to thy God: keep kindness [AV and ERV "mercy"] and justice, and wait for thy God continually." Cheyne (EB) regards hesedh as denoting paternal affection on God's part, answered by filial and loyal affection and brotherly love on man's part (philadelphia in the NT).

The word "lovingkindness" does not occur in the NT, but as its equivalents we have such terms as "mercy," "goodness," "kindness," "brotherly love" (see special articles).

LOW COUNTRY. See SHEPHELAH.

LOWLAND, lō'land (שפלה, sh'phēlāh; cf Arab.

سفالَة, sufālat, "the lowest part"): The western part of Pal, including the maritime plain and the foothills. There has been an attempt to restrict the term to the foothills, at least as far as the more ancient documents are concerned, but there can be little doubt that the maritime plain should be included. RV has "lowland" throughout for sh'phēlāh, while AV has "low country" (2 Ch 26 10; 28 18), "low plains" (1 Ch 27 28; 2 Ch 9 27), "plain" (Jer 17 26; Ob ver 19; Zec 7 7), "vale," or "valley" (Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; 10 40). See COUNTRY; SHEPHELAH. ALFRED ELY DAY

LOZON, lō'zon (Λοζών, Lozōn): Head of a family of Solomon's servants (1 Esd 5 33); called "Darkon" in Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58.

LUBIM, lū'bim (לִּבְיִים, lūbhīm): A people mentioned in the OT (2 Ch 12 3; 16 8; Dnl 11 43; Nah 3 9). In all these cases the word is tr'd in AV "Libyans"; in RV only in Dnl 11 43. The people so named had their seat in North Africa, W. of Egypt (cf Acts 2 10, "the parts of Libya about Cyrene"). See LIBYA. On three different occasions the Libyans invaded Egypt, and at length, in the 10th cent. BC, succeeded in founding an Egypt dynasty under SHISHAK (q.v.).

LUCAS, lū'kas, lōō'kas. In Philem ver 24 AV, for "Luke" (RV).

LUCIFER, lū'si-fēr, lōō'si-fēr: The morning star, an epithet of the planet Venus. See ASTROLOGY, 11.

LUCIUS, lū'shi-us, lū'shus (Λούκιος, Loukios, Λεύκιος, Leukios): A Rom consul who is said (1 Macc 15 16 ff) to have written a letter to Ptolemy apostle John. There was no particular occasion to mention Luke's name in the Gospel, except as the author, if he had so wished. The late legend that Luke was one of the Seventy sent out by Jesus (Epiphanius, Haer., ii.51, 11) is pure conjecture, as is the story that Luke was one of the Greeks who came to Philip for an introduction to Jesus (Jn 12 20f), or the companion of Cleopas in the walk to Emmaus (Lk 24 13). The clear implication of Lk 1 2 is that Luke himself was not an eyewitness of the ministry of Jesus.

In Col 4 14 Luke is distinguished by Paul from those "of the circumcision" (Aristarchus, Mark, Jesus Justus). Epaphras, Luke, De-
3. A Gentile may form the gentile group. He was believed by the early Christian writers to have come directly from heathendom to Christianity. He may or may not have been a Jewish proselyte. His first appearance with Paul at Troas (cf the "we"-sections, Acts 16 10-12) is in harmony with this idea. The classic introduction to the Gospel (1 1-4) shows that he was a man of culture (cf Apollos and Paul). He was a man of the schools, and his Greek has a literary flavor only approached in the NT by Paul's writings and by the Ep. to the He.

His home is very uncertain. The text of D (Codex Bezae) and several Latin authorities have a "we"-passage in Acts 11 27. If this reading, the so-called B text of Blass, is the original, then Luke was at Antioch and may have been present at the great event recorded in Acts 13 1f. But it is possible that the Western text is an interpolation. At any rate, it is not likely that Luke is the same person as Lucius of Acts 13 1. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveler, 389f) thinks that Eusebius (HE, III, iv, 6) does not mean to say that Luke was a native of Antioch, but only that he had Antiochian family connections. Jerome calls him Lucas medicus Antiochensis. He certainly shows an interest in Antioch (cf Acts 11 19-27; 13 1; 14 26; 15 22, 23, 30, 35; 18 22). Antioch, of course, played a great part in the early work of Paul. Other stories make Luke live in Alexandria and Achaia and narrate that he died in Achaia or Bithynia. But we know that he lived in Philippi for a considerable period. He first meets Paul at Troas just before the vision of the Man from Macedonia (Acts 16 10-12), and a conversation with Paul about the work in Macedonia may well have been the human occasion of that vision and call. Luke remains in Philippi when Paul and Silas leave (Acts 16 40, "They . . . departed"). He is here when Paul comes back on his 3d tour bound for Jerus (Acts 20 3-5). He shows also a natural pride in the claims of Philippi to the primacy in the province as against Amphipolis and Thessalonica (Acts 16 12, "the first of the district"). On the whole, then, we may consider Philippi as the home of Luke, though he was probably a man who had traveled a great deal, and may have been with Paul in Galatia before coming to Troas. He may have ministered to Paul in his sickness there (Gal 4 14). His later years were spent chiefly with Paul away from Philippi (cf Acts 20 3-28, 31, on the way to Jerus, at Caesarea, the voyage to Rome and in Rome).

Paul (Col 4 14) expressly calls him "the beloved physician." He was Paul's medical adviser, and doubtless prolonged his life and res-
5. Physician cued him from many a serious illness.

He was a medical missionary, and probably kept up his general practice of medicine in connection with his work in Rome (cf Zahn, Intro, III, 1). He probably practised medicine in Malta (Acts 28 9f). He naturally shows his fondness for medical terms in his books (cf Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Luke; Harnack, NT Studies: Luke the Physician, 175-98). Harnack adds some examples to those given by Hobart, who has overdone the matter in reality. See, further, ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

It is possible, even probable (see Souter's article in DCG), that in 2 Cor 8 18 "the brother" is equivalent to "the brother" of Titus just mentioned, that is, "his brother."
6. Brother of Titus If so, we should know that Paul came into contact with Luke at Philippi on his way to Corinth during his 2d tour (cf also 2 Cor 12 18). It would thus be explained why in Acts the name of Titus does not occur, since he is the brother of Luke the author of the book.

If the reading of D in Acts 11 27f is correct, Luke met Paul at Antioch before the 1st missionary tour. Otherwise it may not have been till Troas on the 2d tour. But he is the more or less constant companion of Paul from Philippi on the return to Jerus on the 3d tour till the 2 years in Rome at the close of the Acts. He was apparently not with Paul when Phil (2 20) was written, though, as we have seen, he was with Paul in Rome when he wrote Col and Philem. He was Paul's sole companion for a while during the 2d Rom imprisonment (2 Tim 4 11). His devotion to Paul in this time of peril is beautiful.

For the proof of the Lukan authorship of the Acts see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. For the discussion of the Lukan authorship of the Gospel with his name, see LUKE, GOSPEL OF.
8. Author of Both Gospel and Acts Our interest in him is largely due to this fact and to his relations with Paul. The Christian world owes him a great debt for his literary productions in the interest of the gospel.

One legend regarding Luke is that he was a painter. Plummer (Comm. on Luke, xxi) thinks that the legend is older than is sometimes supposed and that it has a strong element of truth. It is true that he has drawn vivid scenes with his pen. The early artists were esp. fond of painting scenes from the Gospel of Lk. The allegorical figure of the ox or calf in Ezk 1 and Rev 4 has been applied to Luke's Gospel.

LITERATURE

The five primary uncials (Σ, A, B, C, D) are the chief witnesses for the text of Luke's Gospel. This group is reinforced by L, Δ and the

1. Text Freer (Detroit) MS; R, T, X and Z are also valuable in fragments. The other uncials are of secondary value. The Lat, Egyp and Syr VSS are also of great importance. There are 4 Lat VSS (African, European, Italian, Vulg), 3 Egyp (Memphitic, Sahidic, Bohairic), 5 Syr (Curetonian, Sinaitic, Peshitto, Harclean, Palestinian or Jerusalem). Many of the cursive (minuscule) MSS are also of considerable worth, as are some of the quotations from the Fathers.

Blass, Philology of the Gospels (1898), has advanced the theory of two recensions of this Gospel (a longer and a shorter), such as he holds to be true of Acts. In the case of Acts, the theory has won some acceptance (see Acts of the Apostles), but that is not true of the Gospel to any extent. The Western text of the Gospel is the shorter text, while in Acts it is the longer text. In both instances Blass holds that the shorter text was issued after the longer and original text. His idea is that Luke himself revised and issued the shorter text. In itself this is, of course, possible, since the books are both addressed to an individual, Theophilus. The other edition may have been meant for others. WH explain the omission in the Western text of the Gospel as "Western non-interpolations," and often hold them to be the true text. As samples one may note Lk 10 41; 12 19; 24 36, 40, 42, where the Western text is the shorter text. This is not always true, however, for in 6 2 ff D has the famous passage about the man working on the Sabbath, which the other documents do not give. In Lk 3 22, D has the reading of Ps 2 7 ("Thou art my Son; this day I have begotten thee") for the usual text. Zahn (Intro, III, 38) accepts this as the true text. There is no doubt of the interest and value of the Western readings in Lk, but it cannot be said that Blass has carried his point here. The peculiar mutilation of the Gospel by Marcion has an interest of its own.

Plummer (Comm. on Lk, lxxx) says: "In the second half of the 2d cent. this Gospel is recognized as authentic and authoritative; and it is impossible to show that it had not been thus recognized at a very much earlier date." On the other hand, Schmiedel (EB) says: "This 'tradition,' however, cannot be traced farther back than toward the end of the 2d cent. (Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and the Muratorian Fragment); there is no sound basis for the contention of Zahn (II, 175) that the existence of the tradition can also be found as early as in Marcion, because that writer, from his aversion to the Third Gospel (which nevertheless was the only one he admitted into his collection—with alterations it is true) omitted the expression of honor applied to Luke in Col 4 14." Here the two views are well stated. Schmiedel shows dogmatic bias and prejudice against Lk. Jülicher, however, frankly admits (Intro, 330) that "the ancients were universally agreed that the writer was that Luke, disciple of Paul, who is mentioned in Philem ver 24; 2 Tim 4 11, and called 'the physician' in Col 4 14; presumably a native of Antioch." This statement bears more directly on the question of authorship than of canonicity, but it is a good retort to the rather cavalier tone of Schmiedel, who is reluctant to admit the facts. The recognition of the Third Gospel in the Muratorian Canon (170 AD) is a fact of much significance. It was used in Tatian's Diatessaron (c 170 AD) as one of the four recognized Gospels (cf Hemphill, Diatessaron of Tatian, 3 ff). The fact that Marcion (140 AD) mutilated this Gospel to suit his theology and thus used it is even more significant (cf Sanday, Gospels in the 2d Cent., App.). Other heretics like the Valentinians (cf Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 5-7) made use of it, and Heracleon (cf Clem. Alex., Strom., iv.9) wrote a comm. on it. Irenaeus (end of 2d cent.) makes frequent quotations from this Gospel. He argues that there could be only "four" Gospels because of the four points of the compass—an absurd argument, to be sure, but a powerful testimony to the general acceptance of this Gospel along with the other three. It is needless to appeal to the presence of the Third Gospel in the Curetonian Syr, the Sinaitic Syr, the African Lat—VSS that date to the 2d cent., not to mention the probability of the early date of the Memphitic (Coptic) VSS. Examples of the early use of this Gospel occur in various writings of the 2d cent., as in Justin Martyr (150 AD), the Test. XII P (c 140 AD), Celsus (c AD 160), the Gospel of Peter (2d cent.), the Ep. of the Church of Lyons and Vienne (177 AD), probably also Did. (2d cent.), Clement of Alexandria (190-202 AD), Tertullian (190-220 AD). It is doubtful about Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp; and the Ep. of Barnabas seems to make no use of the Third Gospel. But Clement of Rome, Ignatius and Polycarp quote Acts. But surely the general use and acceptance of the Third Gospel in the early 2d cent. is beyond reasonable doubt. It is not easy to decide when the actual use began, because we have so little data from the 1st cent. (cf Plummer, Comm., lxxiii).

The fact that the author was not an apostle affected the order of the book in some lists. Most MSS and VSS have the common order of today, but the Western order (Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk) is given by D, many Old Lat MSS, the Gothic VS, the Apos Const. The object was probably to place the books by apostles together and first. The Old Lat k has Lk second (Jn, Lk, Mk, Mt), while the Curetonian Syr has Lk last of the four. The cursives 90 and 399 also have Lk second.

The first writers who definitely name Luke as the author of the Third Gospel belong to the end of the 2d cent. They are the Canon of 3. Authorship—Muratorian (possibly by Hippolytus), Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria. We have already seen that Jülicher (Intro, 330) admits that the ancients universally agreed that Luke wrote the Third Gospel. In the early part of the 2d cent. the writers did not, as a rule, give the names of the authors of the Gospels quoted by them. It is not fair, therefore, to use their silence on this point as proof either of their ignorance of the author or of denial of Luke's authorship. Jülicher, for instance, says (Intro, 330): "There is no tradition worthy of the name concerning Luke, whom Papias did not mention, or at any rate did not know." But we owe to Eusebius all the fragments that we have preserved from the writings of Papias. Our ignorance of Papias can hardly be charged up to him. Plummer (Comm., xii) says that nothing in Bib. criticism is more certain than the fact that Luke wrote the Third Gospel. On the other hand, Jülicher (Intro, 331) is not willing to let it go as easily as that. He demands appeal to Acts, and there (ib, 447) he denies the Lukan authorship save as to the "we" sections. J. Weiss (Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments; das Lukas Evang., 1906, 378) admits that but for Acts no sufficient reason would exist for denying the authorship of the Third Gospel to Luke, the disciple of Paul. A Pauline point of view in this Gospel is admitted generally. Many modern critics take it for granted that the Lukan authorship of Acts is disproved, and hence that of the Gospel likewise falls by the way. So argue Baur, Clemen, De Wette, Hausrath, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Pfeiderer, Schürer, Spitta, von Soden, J. Weiss, Weizsäcker, Zeller. Men like Blass, Credner, Harnack, Hawkins, Hobart, Klostermann, Plummer, Ramsay, Renan, Vogel, Zahn, stand by the tradition of Lukan authorship, but Harnack is almost irritated (Luke the Physician, 1907, 6), since "the indefensibility of the tradition is regarded as being so clearly established that nowadays it is thought scarcely worth while to reprove this indefensibility, or even to notice the arguments of conservative opponents." Harnack proceeds to make a plea for a hearing. Jacobus (Standard Bible Dict.) admits that "Acts tells us nothing more of the author than does the Gospel." That is true so far as express mention is concerned, but not so far as natural implication goes. It is true that the place to begin the discussion of the Lukan authorship of the Gospel is Acts. For detailed discussion of the proof that Luke wrote Acts, see Acts of the Apostles. It is there shown that the line of argument which has convinced Harnack, the leader of the liberal criticism of Germany, ought to convince any open-minded critic. It means a good deal when Harnack (Luke the Physician, 14) says: "I subscribe to the words of Zahn (Eint., II, 427): 'Hobart has proved for everyone who can at all appreciate proof that the author of the Lukan work was a man practised in the scientific language of Gr medicine—in short, a Gr physician.'" It is here assumed that the line of argument pursued in the art. on ACTS OF THE APOSTLES is conclusive. If so, little remains to be done in the way of special proof for the Gospel. The author of Acts specifically refers (Acts 1 1) to a former treatise which was likewise addressed to Theophilus. This we find to be the case with the Gospel passing under the name of Luke (1 4). The critics who admit the Lukan authorship of Acts and deny the Lukan authorship of the Gospel are hardly worth considering.

It is, therefore, largely a work of supererogation to give at length the proof from internal grounds that Luke wrote the Gospel, after being convinced about Acts. Still it may be worth while to sketch in outline the line of argument, even though it is very simple. Plummer (Comm., x-xvii) argues three propositions: "(1) The author of the Third Gospel is the author of the Acts. (2) The author of Acts was a companion of Paul. (3) This companion was St. Luke." Harnack (The Acts of the Apostles, 1909) has argued with great minuteness and skill the theory that the same linguistic peculiarities occur in all portions of Acts, including the "we"-sections. He accepts the facts set forth by Hawkins (Horae Synopticae) and adds others. He agrees, therefore, that the author of Acts was a companion of Paul. Harnack is convinced by the exhaustive labors of Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke) that this author was a physician, as we know Luke to have been (Col 4 14). He shows this to be true of the author of Acts by the use of "us" in Acts 28 10, showing that the author of Acts received honors along with Paul, probably because he practised medicine and treated many (cf Harnack, Luke the Physician, 15 f.). These medical terms occur in the Gospel of Lk also, and the same general linguistic style is found in both the Gospel and Acts. Hawkins has made a careful study of likenesses and variations in style in these two books (cf Horae Synopticae, 15-25, 174-89). The argument is as conclusive as such a line of proof can be expected to be. For further discussion see Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1908, 1-68; Zahn, Intro, III, 160 ff. There are no phenomena in the Gospel hostile to this position save the Sem character of chs 1 and 2 (barring the classical introduction 1 1-4). Luke, though a Gentile, has in these chapters the most Sem narrative in the NT. But the explanation is obvious. He is here using Sem material (either oral or written), and has with true artistic skill preserved the tone of the original. To a certain extent the same thing is true of the opening chapters of Acts.

The synoptic problem (see GOSPELS, SYNOPTIC) remains the most difficult one in the realm of NT criticism. But the Gospel of Lk

4. Sources yields on the whole more satisfactory results than is yet true of Mt.

(1) Unity.—If the Lukan authorship of the book is accepted, there remains no serious doubt concerning the unity and integrity of the Gospel. The abridgment of Luke's Gospel used by Marcion does not discredit those portions of the Gospel omitted by him. They are omitted for doctrinal reasons (cf Sanday, Gospels in the 2d Cent., ch viii). His readings are of interest from the viewpoint of textual criticism, as are the quotations of other early writers, but his edition does not seriously challenge the value of Luke's work.

(2) Luke's method.—Luke has announced his methods of work in a most classic introduction (1 1-4). Here we catch a glimpse of the author's personality. That is not possible in Mk nor in Mt, and only indirectly in passing shadows in the Fourth Gospel. But here the author frankly takes the reader into his confidence and discloses his standpoint and qualifications for the great task. He writes as a contemporary about the recent past, always the most difficult history to interpret and often the most interesting. He speaks of "those matters which have been fulfilled among us," in our time. He does not himself claim to have been an eyewitness of "those matters." As we know already, Luke was a Gentile and apparently never saw Jesus in the flesh. He occupies thus a position outside of the great events which he is to record. He does not disguise his intense interest in the narrative, but he claims the historical spirit. He wishes to assure Theophilus of "the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed." He claims to have investigated "the course of all things accurately from the first," just as the true historian would. He thus implies that some of the attempts made had been fragmentary at any rate, and to that extent inaccurate. He has also produced an "orderly" narrative by which Theophilus may gain a just conception of the historical progress of the events connected with the life of Jesus of Nazareth. The fact that "many have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning those matters" does not deter Luke from his task. The rather he is stirred thereby ("It seemed good to me also") to give his interpretation of the life and work of Jesus as the result of his researches. He stands not farther away than one generation from the death of Jesus. He has the keen interest natural to a cultured follower of Jesus in the origin of what had become a great world-movement. He is able to get at the facts because he has had intercourse with eyewitnesses of Jesus and His work, "even as they delivered them unto us, who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word." Luke had abundant opportunity during the two years at Caesarea with Paul (Acts 24-26) to make careful and extended investigations. Many of the personal followers of Jesus were still living (1 Cor 15 6). It was a golden opportunity for Luke's purpose. He had also the written narratives which others ("many") had already drawn up. We are, then, to expect in Luke's Gospel a book closely akin to Acts in style and plan, with the historian's love of accuracy and order, with the author's own contribution in the assimilation and use of this oral and written material. One would not expect in such a writer slavish copying, but intelligent blending of the material into an artistic whole.

(3) The Aramaic infancy narrative.—The very first section in this Gospel (1 5-2 52) illustrates Luke's fidelity in the use of his material. Wellhausen drops these two chapters from his edition of Luke's Gospel as not worthy of consideration. That is conjectural criticism run mad and is not to be justified by the example of Marcion, who begins with ch 4. Wright (Gospel acc. to St. Luke in Gr, 1900, viii f; s.v. "Luke's Gospel," DCG) holds that this section was the last to be added to the Gospel though he holds that it comes from Luke. It may be said in passing that Wright is a stout advocate for the oral source for all of Luke's Gospel. He still holds out against the "two-document" or any document theory. However, he claims rightly that Luke's information for these two chapters was private. This material did not form part of the current oral Gospel. In Mt the narrative of the birth of Jesus is given from the standpoint of Joseph, and Mary is kept in the background, according to Eastern feeling (Wright). But in Lk the story is told from Mary's point of view. Luke may, indeed, have seen Mary herself in the years 57-59 AD (or 58-60). He could easily have seen some of Mary's intimate friends who knew the real facts in the case. The facts were expressly said to have been kept in Mary's heart. She would tell only to sympathetic ears (cf Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 74 f). It is not possible to discredit Luke's narrative of the Virgin Birth on a priori grounds (cf Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1907; Sweet, Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1906). The curious Sem flavor of this narrative argues strongly for its genuineness, since Luke was a Greek. We do not know whether Luke knew Aram. or not. That was possible, since he spent these 2 years in Pal. We do not know whether this information came to him in written form (note esp. the hymns of Mary and of Zacharias) or in oral tradition. But it is hardly possible to credit a Greek with the invention of these birth-narratives and poems which ring so true to the soil and the Heb life. Immediately after Luke's statement about historical research comes the narrative of the birth of Jesus. It is the first illustration of his work on his sources.

(4) Luke's relation to Mark's Gospel.—Luke knew Mark in Rome (Col 4 10.14; Philem ver 24). He may have met him in Pal also. Had he seen Mark's Gospel when he wrote his own? Was it one of the "many" narratives that came under Luke's eye? Wright (cf DCG) denies that Luke had our Mk. He admits that he may have had an Urmarkus or proto-Mk which he heard in oral form, but not the present (written) Gospel of Mk. He thinks that this can best be accounted for by the fact that out of 223 sections in Mk there are 54 not in Lk. But most modern critics have come to the conclusion that both Matthew and Luke had Mk before them as well as other sources. Matthew, if he used Mk, in the early chapters, followed a topical arrangement of his material, combining Mk with the other source or sources. But Luke has followed the order of Mk very closely in this part and indeed throughout. Luke has a special problem in 9 51—19 27, but the broad general outline follows that of Mk. But it cannot be said that Luke made a slavish use of Mk, if he had this Gospel before him. He gives his own touch to each incident and selects what best suits his purpose. It is not possible for us to tell always that motive, but it is idle to suppose that Luke blindly recorded every incident found in every document or every story that came to his ears. He implies in his introduction that he has made a selection out of the great mass of material and has woven it into a coherent and progressive narrative. We may admit with Harnack (New Testament Studies: Sayings of Jesus, xiii) that the Markan problem "has been treated with scientific thoroughness" and that Luke had Mk as one of his sources. The parallel between Lk and Mk in the narrative portion is easily seen in any Harmony of the Gospels, like Broadus or Stevens and Burton.

(5) Q (Quelle) or the Logia.—It is a matter of more uncertainty when we come to the mass of material common to Mt and Lk, but absent from Mk. This is usually found in the discourses of Jesus. The more generally accepted theory today is that both Matthew and Luke made use of Mk and also this collection of Logia called Q for short (Ger. Quelle, "source"). But, while this theory may be adopted as a working hypothesis, it cannot be claimed that it is an established fact. Zahn (cf Intro) stoutly stands up for the real authorship of the First Gospel of Matthew. Rev. Arthur Carr ("Further Notes on the Synoptic Problem," Expos, January, 1911, 543–553) argues strongly for the early date and Matthean authorship of the First Gospel. He says on the whole subject: "The synoptic problem which has of late engaged the speculation of some of our keenest and most laborious students is still unsolved." He even doubts the priority of Mark's Gospel. Wellhausen (Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, 73–89) advocates the priority of Mark to Q. But Harnack balances the problem of "Q and St. Mark" (Sayings of Jesus, 193–233) and decides in favor of Q. In any case, it is to be noted that the result of critical research into the value of Q is to put it quite on a par with Mk. Harnack is quite impressed with the originality and vivid reality of the matter in Q. The material present in Q cannot be gauged so accurately as that in Mk, since we have the Gospel of Mk in our hands. Where both Mt and Lk give material not found in Mk, it is concluded that this is drawn from Q. But it cannot be shown that Matthew may not have used Q at some points and Lk at still others independently. Besides Q may have contained material not preserved either in Mt or Lk. A careful and detailed comparison of the material common to both Mt and Lk and absent from Mk may be found in Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 107–13; Harnack, Sayings of Jesus, 127–82; Wellhausen, Einleitung, 66; Robertson, "Matthew" in Bible for Home and School, 14–19. But, if it is true that Luke made use of Q as of Mk, he was no mere copyist. No solution of the synoptic problem can ever be obtained on the idea that the Gospels are mere reproductions of previous documents. There was freedom in the use of all the material, both oral and written, and the writer gave his own interpretation to the result. It was often a re-statement in the author's own language, not formal quotation. Wright (DCG) calls this editorial element "editorial notes"; that is, of course, often true when the author makes comments on the matters presented, but "ancient authors took immense pains to reduce the rude chronicles which they used, into literary form" (ib). The point of all this is that a great deal of criticism of the Gospels is attempting the impossible, for many of the variations cannot possibly be traced to any "source." Wright (ib) puts it tersely again: "And if in St. John's Gospel it is more and more recognized that the mind of the evangelist cast the utterances of Our Lord into the peculiar form which they there hold, the same process of redaction may be observed in St. Luke, who comes nearest of the synoptists to the methods of St. John." As a matter of fact, this is as it should be expected. The frank recognition of this point of view marks progress in synoptic criticism.

(6) Other sources.—There is a large block of material in Lk (9 51—18 14) which is given by him alone. There are various sayings like some reported by Matthew (or Mark) in other connections. Some of the incidents are similar to some given elsewhere by Matthew and Mark. There are various theories concerning this position of Lk. Some critics hold that Luke has here put a mass of material which he had left over, so to speak, and which he did not know where to locate, without any notion of order. Against this theory is the express statement of Luke that he wrote an orderly narrative (1 3 f). One is disposed to credit Luke's own interpretation unless the facts oppose it. It is common for traveling preachers, as was Jesus, to have similar experiences in different parts of the country and to repeat their favorite sayings. So teachers repeat many of their sayings each year to different classes. Indeed, it is just in this section of Lk that the best parts of his Gospel are found (the parables of the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, the Pharisee and the Publican, etc.). "The more we consider this collection, the more we are entranced with it. It is the very cream of the Gospel, and yet (strange to say) it is peculiar to Luke" (Wright, DCG). Wright calls this "a Pauline collection," not because Paul is responsible for the material, but because the chapters breathe the cosmopolitan spirit of Paul. That is true, but Jesus loved the whole world. This side of the teaching of Jesus may have appealed to Luke powerfully because of its reflection in Paul. Matthew's Gospel was more narrowly Jewish in its outlook, and Mark's had fewer of the sayings of Christ. But it is to be noted that this special material in Lk extends more or less all through the Gospel. Burton (Some Principles of Literary Criticism and Their Application to the Synoptic Problem, 49) calls this special material in Lk 9 51—18 14 "the Peraean document." We do not know, of course, anything of the actual source of this material. Whether Luke has here followed one or more documents, he has, as elsewhere, given his own stamp to the whole, while preserving in a marvelous way the spirit of Jesus. (For the possible parallel between this section of Lk and Jn see Robertson's "Notes" to Broadus, Harmony of the Gospels, 249-52.) For the earlier material in Lk not found elsewhere (3 7-15.17.18; 4 2b-13 [14.15].16-30; 5 1-11; 6 21-49; 7 1-8 3) Burton suggests "the Galilean document" as the source. Wright, on the other hand, proposes "anonymous fragments" as the source of Luke's material not in the infancy narrative, nor in Mk, nor in Q, nor in the "Pauline" or Peraean document. At any rate, it is certain that Luke's own words of explanation should warn us against drawing too narrow a line around the "sources" used by him. His "many" may well have included a dozen sources, or even more. But it may be said, in a word, that all that criticism has been able to learn on the subject has confirmed the statement of Luke himself concerning his method of research and his use of the material.

More fault has been found with Luke as a historian in Acts than in the Gospel. Harnack (Acts of the Apostles) is not disposed to give

5. Credibility Luke full credit as a reliable historian. But Ramsay (Luke the Physician, 5) champions the reliability of Luke (cf also St. Paul the Traveller; The Church in the Roman Empire) against the skepticism of Harnack, which is growing less, since in the Theol. Literaturzeitung (July 7, 1906, S. 4) he speaks well of Luke's ability to secure correct information. So in Luke the Physician (121-45) Harnack urges that the possible "instances of incredibility have been much exaggerated by critics." He adds about Acts 5 36: "It is also possible that there is a mistake in Jos" (cf Chase, Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles; see also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES).

But the Gospel is not free from attack. The chief matter in the Gospel of Lk which is challenged on historical grounds, apart from the birth-narratives, which some critics treat as legendary, is the census in Lk 2 1 ff. Critics, who in general have accepted Luke's veracity, have sometimes admitted that here he fell into error and confused the census under Quirinius in 6-7 AD when Quirinius came, after the banishment of Archelaus, to take a census and to collect taxes, much to the indignation of the Jews (cf Acts 5 37; Jos, Ant. XVIII, 1). It was not known that Quirinius had been governor of Syria before this time, nor was there any other knowledge of a census under Augustus. The case against Luke seemed strong. But Ramsay (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 227 ff) shows that the inscription at Tibur, as agreed by Mommsen and like authorities, shows that Quirinius twice governed Syria as legatus of the divine Augustus. He was consul in 12 BC, so that the first mission was after that date. Ramsay shows also from the papyri that the 14-year cycle was used for the Rom census (many census papers are known from 20 AD on). He argues that the first one was instituted by Augustus in 8 BC. Herod, as a vassal king, would naturally be allowed to conduct it in the Jewish fashion, not the Rom, and it was probably delayed several years in the provinces. Thus once more Luke is vindicated in a remarkable way (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, I, 1, [2]).

The Acts of the Apostles has come out of the critical ordeal in a wonderful manner, so that Luke's credit as a historical writer is now very high among those qualified to know the facts. He has been tested and found correct on so many points that the presumption is in his favor where he cannot as yet be verified. Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 265) finds Luke "more graphic than historical."

He was the most versatile of the Gospel writers. He was a Greek, a Christian, a physician, a man of 6. Characteristics pathetic, cultured, poetic, spiritual, artistic, high-minded. His Prologue is the most classic piece of Gr in the NT, but the rest of ch 1 and all of ch 2 are the most Sem in tone. The breadth of his literary equipment is thereby shown. He not only uses many medical terms common to technical circles, but he has the physician's interest in the sick and afflicted, as shown in the large number of miracles of healing narrated. His interest in the poor is not due to Ebionitic prejudice against the rich, but to human compassion for the distressed. His emphasis on the human side of the work of Jesus is not due to Ebionitic denial of the Divinity of Jesus, but to his keen appreciation of the richness of the human life of the Son of God. His rich and varied vocabulary reveals a man who read and mingled with the best life of his time. He wrote his books in the vernacular, but the elevated vernacular of an educated man touched with a distinct literary flavor. His poetic temperament is shown in the preservation of the beautiful hymns of the nativity and in the wonderful parables of Jesus in chs 10, 15-18. They are reported with rare grace and skill. Luke is fond of showing Christ's sympathy with women and children, and he has more to say about prayer than the authors of the other Gospels. His interest in individuals is shown by the dedication of both his books to Theophilus. His cosmopolitan sympathies are natural in view of his training and inheritance, but part of it is doubtless due to his association with the apostle Paul. He comes to the interpretation of Jesus from a world-standpoint and does not have to overcome the Pharisaic limitations incident to one reared in Pal. It is a matter of rejoicing that we have this book, called by Renan the most beautiful book in the world, as a cultured Greek's interpretation of the origin of Christianity. He thus stands outside of the pale of Judaism and can see more clearly the world-relations and world-destiny of the new movement. With Luke, Jesus is distinctly the world's Saviour. The accent on sin is human sin, not specifically Jewish sin. John in his Gospel came in his old age to look back upon the events in Judaea from a non-Jewish standpoint. But he rose to the essentially spiritual and eternal apprehension of Christ, rather than extended his vision, as Luke did, to the cosmopolitan mission and message of Jesus, though this did not escape John. The Gospel of Lk thus has points of affinity with Paul, John and the author of He in style and general standpoint. But while Luke's own style is manifest throughout, it is not obtrusive. He hides himself behind the wonderful portrait of Jesus which he has here drawn in undying colors.

The extreme position of Baur and Zeller may be dismissed at once. There is no reason for dating the Gospel of Lk in the 2d cent. on the

7. Date ground that he used Marcion's Gospel, since it is now admitted all round that Marcion made use of Lk. The supposed use of Jos by Luke (see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES for discussion and refutation) leads a goodly number of radical scholars (Hilgenfeld, Holsten, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Krenkel, Weizsäcker, Wernle) to date the book at the end of the 1st cent. This is still extreme, as Harnack had already shown in his Chronologie der altchristl. Litt., I, 1897, 246-50. Any use of Jos by Luke is highly improbable (see Plummer on Lk, xxix). The Gospel was certainly written before Acts (Acts 1 1) and while Paul was alive, if 1 Tim 5 18 be taken as a quotation from Lk 10 7, which is by no means certain, however. But it is true that the most natural way to interpret the sudden close of Acts, after 2 years in Rome (Acts 28 31), is the fact that Luke finished the book at that time (Maclean, 1-vol HDB). Moffatt (Historical NT, 273) calls this early date "reactionary" and "extravagant." But it is supported by Alford, Blass, Ebrard, Farrar, Gloag, Godet, Grau, Guericke, Hahn, Headlam, Hitzig, Hofmann, Hug, Keil, Lange, Lumby, Marshall, Nösgen, Oosterzee, Resch, Riehm, Schaft, Schanz, Thiersch, Tholuck, Wieseler, and Harnack himself is now ready to join this goodly company. He warns critics against too hasty a closing of the chronological question (Acts of the Apostles, 291), and admits that Acts was written "perhaps so early as the beginning of the 7th decade of the 1st cent." [ib, 297], "the Acts (and therefore also the Gospel)." In the Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels (1911, 124) Harnack says: "It seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this great historical order were written while St. Paul was still alive." There is an intermediate date about 80 AD, assigned by Adeney, Bartlett, Plummer, Sanday, Weiss, Wright, on the ground that the investigations mentioned in Lk 1 1-4 describe the use of narratives which could have been written only after a long period of reflection. But that is not a valid objection. There is no sound critical reason why the Gospel of Mk, Q, the infancy narratives, and all the other sources alluded to by this preface could not have been in circulation in Pal by 55 AD. Indeed, Allen writes in Expos T (July, 1910): "I see no reason why such an original [Mark's Gospel in Aram.] should not have appeared before the year 50 AD." The other objection to the early date comes out of Lk 21 20, "Jerusalem compassed with armies" as compared with "the abomination of desolation" in Mk 13 14. The change is so specific that it is held by some critics to be due to the fact that Luke is writing after the destruction of Jerus. But it is just as likely (Maclean) that Luke has here interpreted the Hebraism of Mk for his gentile readers. Besides, as Plummer (p. xxxi) shows, Luke in 21 5-36 does not record the fact that Jerus was destroyed, nor does he change Christ's "flee to the mountains" to "Pella in North Peraea," whither the Christians actually fled. Besides, the fact that Acts shows no acquaintance with Paul's Epp. is best explained on the assumption of the early date. The question is thus practically settled in favor of the early date. The place of the writing is not known. The early date naturally falls in with Caesarea (Blass, Michaelis, Thiersch), but there is little to guide one.

A. T. ROBERTSON

LUNATIC(K), lū'na-tik:

I. Epilepsy.—The Eng. word "lunatic," which in popular speech signifies a sufferer from any mental derangement, whether periodic or chronic, 1. Incorrect other than congenital idiocy, appears in AV as a tr of the Gr word σεληνιαζομαι, selēniázomai, in the two passages where it occurs. In RV the word has very properly been displaced by the strictly accurate term "epileptic." This change is justified not only by the extra-Bib. usage (see Liddell and Scott, s.v.), but clearly enough by Mt 17 15 (cf 4 24), where epilepsy is circumstantially described.

The original meaning of the term selēniázomai, "moon-struck," is connected with the popular belief, widespread and of strange persistence, that the moon, in certain of its phases, is injurious to human beings, esp. in the case of diseases of a periodic or remittent character. There are no data by which to determine whether, in the NT times, this particular word represented a living and active belief or had passed into the state of usage in which the original metaphor disappears, and the word simply indicates the fact signified without reference to the idea embodied in the etymology. We still use the word "lunatic" to signify a person mentally diseased, although we have long since ceased to believe in the moon's influence in such cases.

II. Madness.—The Bible designates "madness," or alienation of mind, by various terms, all of which seem to be onomatopoeitic. These various words seem to be derived from the strange and fierce or mournful cries uttered by the unfortunate victims of this dread malady. In Dt 28 34 the word "maddened" is מְשֻׁחָּה, m'shuggā, part. of שָׁחַח, shāgha' (cf also 1 S 21 15). With this corresponds the word μαίνομαι, mainomai, in the NT. In 1 S 21 13 (Heb 14) the word is a form of the vb. הָלַל, hālāl, which is also a derivative from the sound indicated.

In certain cases, though by no means uniformly, madness is ascribed to demon-possession (Lk 8 26 f). One is struck by the fact that mental derangement occupies a very small place in Scripture.

LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET

LURK, lûrk, LURKING-PLACE, lûrk'ing-plās: "To lurk" means "to lie in wait," usually with intent to do harm (see Ps 17 12; Prov 1 11.18).

Lurking-place, a place of hiding, usually for the purpose of murder. See 1 S 23 23; Ps 10 8.

LUST (5 Heb and 5 Gr words are so rendered, viz.:

[1] נָפֶשֶׁת, nephesh, [2] שִׁרְרִירֻת, sh'rîrûth, [3] תַּאֲוָה, ta'āwāh, [4] הָמָדָה, hāmādāh, [5] אַוָּה, 'āwāh; [1] ἐπιθυμία, epithymia, [2] ἡδονή, hēdonē, [3] ἐπιποθέω, epipothēō, [4] ὀρεξις, ōrexis, [5] πάθος, páthos): The word both as vb. and as subst. has a good and a bad meaning. It probably meant at first a strong desire, a craving, abnormal appetite, not only for physical but for spiritual satisfaction. It has come, however, to be confined in its use almost entirely to the bad sense. Some old tr<sup>s</sup> are not accepted now, the word being used in connections which at present seem almost irreverent. Shades of meaning are learned from an examination of the Heb and Gr originals.

The subst. and vbs. are: (1) Nephesh, in Ex 15 9 and Ps 78 18 tr<sup>d</sup> "desire"; "My desire shall be satisfied"; "by asking food according to their desire." A strong but not sensual sense. (2) Shēr-rūth, meaning "obstinacy" evil imagination. Jeh said (Ps 81 12), "I let them go after the stubbornness of their heart," a wilful self-satisfaction. (3) Ta'āwāh, "a delight," "a longing satisfaction," and so it came to mean "sinful pleasure." Tr<sup>d</sup> in Ps 78 30, "that which they desired," intensely longed for, referring to Jeh's provision of food in the wilderness. Also in Nu 11 4 concerning "flesh to eat," it is said the multitude "lusted exceedingly," i.e. "craved eagerly." (4) Hāmādh, the vb. meaning "to delight in," "greatly beloved," "covet," probably for evil purposes. The young man is warned against the evil woman (Prov 6 25): "Lust not after her beauty." Here the bad sense is evident, for in the same connection are used such expressions as "harlot," "adulteress," "evil woman." (5) Āwāh, meaning "greatly to desire," long after, with undue emphasis, with evil spirit though not perhaps with impure thought. In Nu 11 34 reference is made to a place called kībhrōth ha-ta'āwāh, "the graves of lust," where "they buried the people that lusted." Ps 106 14 also refers to the Israelites who "lusted exceedingly." Tr<sup>d</sup> in Dt 12 15.21 "desire of thy soul"; 12 20; 14 26, "thy soul desireth." These Dt passages evidently mean lust only in the good sense.

As in the OT, so in the NT we find both meanings of the word. (1) Epithumia is used most frequently, and means a longing for the

The following references hold the idea, not only of sinful desire known as "fleshly," "worldly," as opposed to "spiritual," "heavenly," "the will of man" as opposed to "the will of God," but also the sensual desire connected with adultery, fornication; vb. in Mt 5 28; Mk 4 19; Jn 8 44; Rom 1 24; 1 Cor 10 6; Gal 5 16.17.24; Tit 2 12; 1 Pet 1 14; 1 Jn 2 16f; Jude vs 16.18; Rev 18 14. (2) Hēdonē, delight in sensuality, hence wicked pleasures; tr<sup>d</sup> in Jas 4 1.3 "pleasures": "Your pleasures that war in your members"; "Ye ask amiss, that ye may spend it in your pleasures" (AV "lusts"). (3) Epipotheō means to crave intensely the wrong possession; tr<sup>d</sup> in Jas 4 5 "long [AV "lusteth"] unto envying." (4) Orexis, used in Rom 1 27, from context evidently meaning "lust" in the worst sense; tr<sup>d</sup> "lust." (5) Pathos, meaning "passion," inordinate affection, with the idea in it of suffering; tr<sup>d</sup> in 1 Thess 4 5 "passion of lust."

LUTE, lūt (לֹּט, nebhel; thus RV; AV viol [Isa 5 12]): Nebhel is rendered elsewhere by "psaltory" or "viol." The lute was originally an Arab. instrument. It resembled a guitar, though with a longer and more slender neck. The name is derived from Arab. al'ood, with a of art. elided; hence Italian luto; Fr. luth. See MUSIC.

LUZ (לֹּז, lūz): The Heb word means "almond tree" or "almond wood" (OHL, s.v.). It may also mean "bone," particularly a bone of the spine, and might be applied to a rocky height supposed to resemble a backbone (Lagarde, Uebersicht., 157 f). Winckler explains it by Aram. laudh, "asylum," which might be suitably applied to a sanctuary (Geschichte Israels). Cheyne (EB, s.v.) would derive it by corruption from hāluqāh, "strong [city]."

(1) This was the ancient name of Bethel (Gen 28 19; Jgs 1 23; cf Gen 35 6; 48 3; Josh 16 2; 18 13). It has been thought that Josh 16 2 contradicts this, and that the two places were distinct. Referring to Gen 28 19, we find that the name Bethel was given to "the place," ha-mākōm, i.e. "the sanctuary," probably "the place" (ver 11, Heb) associated with the sacrifice of Abraham (12 8), which lay to the E. of Bethel. The name of the city as distinguished from "the place" was Luz. As the fame of the sanctuary grew, we may suppose, its name overshadowed, and finally superseded, that of the neighboring town. The memory of the ancient nomenclature persisting among the people sufficiently explains the allusions in the passages cited.

(2) A Bethelite, the man who betrayed the city into the hands of the children of Joseph, went into the land of the Hittites, and there founded a city which he called Luz, after the ancient name of his native place (Jgs 1 26). No satisfactory identification has been suggested. W. EWING

LYCAONIA, lik-a-ō'ni-a, li-ka-ō'ni-a (Λυκαονία, Lukaonia [Acts 14 6], Λυκαονιστί, Lukaonisti, [Acts 14 11, "in the speech of Lycaonia"]); Lycaonia is meant, according to the South Galatian view, by the expression τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν, tēn Galatikēn chōran, in Acts 18 23, and the incidents in Acts 16 1-4 belong to L.): Was a country in the central and southern part of Asia Minor whose boundaries and extent varied at different periods. In the time of Paul, it was bounded on the N. by Galatia proper (but lay in the Rom province Galatia), on the E. by Cappadocia, on the S. by Cilicia Tracheia, and on the W. by Pisidia and Phrygia. The boundary of Phrygia and L. passed between Iconium and Lystra (see ICONIUM). L. consists of a level plain, waterless and treeless, rising at its southern fringe for some distance into the foothills of Taurus, and broken on its eastern side by the volcanic mass of Kara-Dagh and by many smaller hills. Strabo informs us that King Anyntas of Galatia fed many flocks of sheep on the Lycaonian plain. Much of the northern portion of L. has been proved by recent discovery to have belonged to the Rom emperors, who inherited the crown lands of Amyntas.

In Acts 14 6 L. is summed up as consisting of the cities of Lystra and Derbe and the district (including many villages) lying around them. This description refers to a particular division of L., which alone is mentioned in the Bible. In the time of Paul, L. consisted of two parts, a western and an eastern. The western part was a "region" or subdivision of the Rom province Galatia; the eastern was called Lycaonia Antiochiana, after Antiochus of Commagene under whom it had been placed in 37 AD. This non-Rom portion was traversed by Paul; but nothing is recorded of his journey through it (see DERBE). It included the important city of Laranda; and when L. is described as consisting of the cities of Lystra and Derbe and the surrounding district, the writer is clearly thinking only of the western portion of L., which lay in, and formed a "region" of, the province Galatia. This is the tract of country which is meant in Acts 18 23, where it is called the "region" of Galatia, and placed side by side with Phrygia, another region of Galatia. The province Galatia was divided into districts technically known as "regions," and Rom L. is called the "region of Galatia" in implied contrast with Antiochian L., which lay outside the Rom province. Of the language of L. (see LYSTRA) nothing survives except some personal and place-names, which are discussed in Kretschmar's Einführung in die Gesch. der griech. Sprache.

LYCIA, lish'i-a (Λυκία, Lukia): An ancient country forming the southeast portion of Asia Minor. The surface of Lycia is exceedingly rugged, and its lofty mountains rise almost directly from the sea. Over them several trade routes or passes lead from the coast to the interior. Down the mountain sides rush many small rivers, of which the Xanthus is the chief. The history of L., like that of the neighboring countries, forms a part of the history of Asia Minor. Successively it was in the possession of the Persians, of Alexander the Great, of the Seleucid kings and of the Ptolemies. In 188 BC it fell into the hands of the Romans, who gave it to the island of Rhodes; 20 years later, because of its loyalty to Rome, it became free and independent (1 Macc 15 23). In 53 AD, during the reign of the emperor Claudius, it became a Rom province, and in 74 AD it was united with Pamphylia to form a double province over which a Rom governor presided.

At different times during the history of L., there were about 100 places which issued coins of their own. Pliny speaks of 70 cities which had existed there, but in his age there were but 36. Of these, Patara, Myra and Phaselis are of interest to Bible students. From the coast city of Patara, according to Acts 21 1f, Paul took ship for Phoenicia. It was a place celebrated not only as a trading-center, and a port of entry to the interior, but as the seat of the oracle of Apollo, and the birthplace of St. Nicholas. Myra, though over 2 miles from the coast, possessed a harbor, and was also a trading-center. Here, according to Acts 27 5-38, Paul found a corn ship from Alexandria. For some time Myra was the capital of the Rom province; to Christendom it is esp. known as the home of St. Nicholas, who was its bishop and the patron saint of the sailors along the coast. Phaselis, on the border of Pamphylia, was also the home of the bishop.

L. was a stopping-place, rather than the scene of the active work of Paul, and therefore it figures little in the earliest history of Christianity. For a long time the people strongly opposed the introduction of a strange religion, and in 312 AD they even petitioned the Rom emperor Maximin against it. A portion of the petition has been discovered at Arykander.

LYDIA, lid'i-a (Λυδία, Ludia): An important country in the western part of Asia Minor bounded on the N. by Mysia, on the E. by Phrygia, on the S. by Caria, and on the W. by the Aegean Sea. Its surface is rugged, but along the valleys between its mountain ranges ran some of the most important highways from the coast cities to the distant interior. Of its many rivers the chief are the Cayster, the Lower Hermus, the Cogamos, the Caicus and, during a part of its course, the Maeander.

Lydia was an exceedingly ancient and powerful kingdom whose history is composed chiefly of that of its individual cities. In 546 BC it fell into the hands of the Persians, and in 334 BC it became a part of Alexander's empire. After the death of Alexander its possession was claimed by the kings both of Pergamos and of Seleucia, but in 190 BC it became the undisputed possession of the former (1 Macc 8 8). With the death of Attalus III, 133 BC, it was transferred by the will of that king to Rome, and L., which then became but a name, formed, along with Caria, Mysia and Phrygia, a part of the Rom province of Asia (see ASIA). Chief among its cities were Smyrna and Ephesus, two of the most important in Asia Minor, and Smyrna is still the largest and wealthiest city of that part of Turkey. At Ephesus, the seat of the goddess Diana, Paul remained longer than elsewhere in Asia, and there his most important missionary work was done (Acts 19). Hence L. figures prominently in the early history of the church; it became Christianized during the residence of the apostle at Ephesus, or soon afterward (see also LUD).

E. J. BANKS

LYDIA, lid'i-a (Λυδία, Ludia): The fem. of Lydian, a native of Lydia, a large country on the W. of Asia Minor, and the name of St. Paul's first convert in Europe. This name was a popular one for women (cf Horace Odes i.8; iii.9; vi.20), but Ramsay thinks she "was familiarly known in the town by the ethnic that showed her origin" (HDB, s.v. "Lydia"; cf St. Paul the Traveller, 214). It has always been and is still a common custom in the Orient to refer to one living in a foreign land by employing the adj. which designates the nationality. Kenan thinks it means "the Lydian"; Thyatira is a city of Lydia. Lydia was (1) living in Philippi, (2) of the city of Thyatira, (3) a seller of the purple-dyed garments from her native town, (4) and "one that worshipped God." Her occupation shows her to have been a woman of some capital. The phrase which describes her religion (sebomēnē tōn Theōn) is the usual designation for a proselyte. She was in the habit of frequenting a place of prayer by a riverside, a situation convenient for the necessary ablutions required by the Jewish worship, and there Paul and his companions met her. After she had been listening to St. Paul (Gr impf.), the Lord opened her heart to give heed to his teaching ("To open is the part of God, to pay attention that of the woman," Chrysostom). Her baptism and that of her household followed. To prove her sincerity she besought the missionaries to accept the hospitality of her home. Her house probably became the center for the church in Philippi (Acts 16 14.15.40). L. is not mentioned in St. Paul's letter to the Philippian, but, if Ramsay be correct, she may have been Euodias or Syntyche (Phil 4 2). S. F. HUNTER

LYE, li. See NITRE.

LYING, li'ing. See LIE.

LYSIAS, li-sā'ni-as (Λυσίας, Lusias): Mentioned in Lk 3 1 as tetrarch of Abilene in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, and thus fixing the date of the preaching of John the Baptist in the wilderness at about 26 or 28 AD. A Lysias is mentioned by Jos as having ruled over Chalcis and Abilene, and as having been slain by Mark Antony at the instigation of Cleopatra. As this happened about 36 BC, Luke has been charged with inaccuracy. Inscriptions, however, corroborate the view that the L. of Luke was probably a descendant of the L. mentioned by Jos (cf Schürer, HJP, div I, vol II, App. 1, p. 338). C. M. KERR

LYSIAS, lis'i-as (Λυσίας, Lusias):

(1) "A noble man, and one of the blood royal" whom Antiochus Epiphanes (c 166 BC) left with the government of Southern Syria and the guardianship of his son, while he went in person into Persia to collect the revenues which were not coming in satisfactorily (1 Macc 3 32; 2 Macc 10 11). According to Jos (Ant, XII, vii, 2), the instructions of Lysias were "to conquer Judaea, enslave its inhabitants, utterly destroy Jerus and abolish the whole nation." L., accordingly, armed against Judas Maccabaeus a large force under Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, Nicanor and Gorgias. Of this force Judas defeated the two divisions under Nicanor and Gorgias near Emmaus (166 BC), and in the following year L. himself at Bethsura (1 Macc 4), after which he proceeded to the purification of the temple. In the narration of these campaigns there are considerable differences between the writers of 1 Macc and 2 Macc which scholars have not found easy to explain. Antiochus died at Babylon on his Pers expedition (164 BC), and L. assumed the office of regent during the minority of his son, who was yet a child (1 Macc 6 17). He collected another army at Antioch, and after the recapture of Bethsura was besieging Jerus when he learned of the approach of Philip to whom Antiochus, on his deathbed, had intrusted the guardianship of the prince (1 Macc 6 15; 2 Macc 13). He defeated Philip in 163 BC and was supported at Rome, but in the following year he fell with his ward Antiochus into the hands of Demetrius I (Soter), who put both of them to death (1 Macc 7 1-23).

LYSIMACHUS, li-sim'a-kus (Λυσίμαχος, Lusimachos):

(1) The son of Ptolemy, of Jerus, is named (Ad Est 11 1) as the interpreter (translator of the Rest of Esther into Gr). See ESTHER, THE REST OF.

(2) Brother of Menelaus, a Gr name said by Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1) to have been assumed by Onias, the high priest in the hellenizing days of Antiochus Epiphanes, as the Jewish name Jesus was changed to Jason. When Menelaus was summoned to Antioch (2 Macc 4 29) on a charge of malversation, he left L. as his deputy in the priesthood at Jerus. L. robbed the temple and caused an insurrection in which he met his death beside the treasury (2 Macc 4 42). The name of L. does not appear in the narrative of these events given by Jos.

J. HUTCHISON

LYSTRA, lis'tra: The forms Λύστραν, Lústran, and Λύστροις, Lústrois, occur. Such variation in the gender of Anatolian city-names is common (see Harnack, Apostelgeschichte, 86; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 128). Lystra was visited by Paul 4 t (Acts 14 6, 21; 16 1; 18 23—the last according to the "South Galatian" theory), and is mentioned in 2 Tim 3 10 f as one of the places where Paul suffered persecution. Timothy resided in L. (Acts 16 1).

L. owed its importance, and the attention which Paul paid to it, to the fact that it had been made a

Rom colonia by Augustus (see ΑΝΤΙΟΧ), and was therefore, in the time of Paul, a center of education and enlightenment. Nothing is known of its earlier, and little of its later, history. The site of L. was placed by Leake (1820) at a hill near Khatyn Serai, 18 miles S.S.W. from Iconium; this identification was proved correct by an inscription found by Sterrett in 1885. The boundary between Phrygia and Lycaonia passed between Iconium and L. (Acts 14 6) (see ICONIUM).

The population of L. consisted of the local aristocracy of Rom soldiers who formed the garrison of the colonia, of Greeks and Jews (Acts 16 1, 3), and of native Lycaonians (Acts 14 11).

After Paul had healed a life-long cripple at L., the native population (the "multitude" of Acts 14 11) regarded him and Barnabas as 2. Worship pagan gods come down to them in the of Paul and likeness of men, and called Barnabas Barnabas "Zeus" and Paul "Hermes." Commentators on this incident usually point out that the same pair of divinities appeared to Baucis and Philemon in Ovid's well-known story, which he locates in the neighboring Phrygia. The accuracy in detail of this part of the narrative in Acts has been strikingly confirmed by recent epigraphic discovery. Two inscriptions found in the neighborhood of L. in 1909 run as follows: (1) "Kakkan and Maramoas and Iman Licinius priests of Zeus"; (2) "Toues Macrinus also called Abascantus and Batasis son of Bretasis having made in accordance with a vow at their own expense [a statue of] Hermes Most Great along with a sun-dial dedicated it to Zeus the sun-god."

Now it is evident from the narrative in Acts that the people who were prepared to worship Paul and Barnabas as gods were not Greeks or Romans, but native Lycaonians. This is conclusively brought out by the use of the phrase "in the speech of Lycaonia" (Acts 14 11). The language in ordinary use among the educated classes in Central Anatolian cities under the Rom Empire was Gr; in some of those cities, and esp. of course, in Rom colonies, Lat also was understood, and it was used at this period in official documents. But the Anatolian element in the population of those cities continued for a long time to use the native language (e.g. Phrygian was in use at Iconium till the 3d cent. of our era; see ICONIUM). In the story in Acts, a fast distinction is implied, and in fact existed, between the ideas and practices of the Greeks and the Rom colonists and those of the natives. This distinction would naturally maintain itself most vigorously in so conservative an institution as religious ritual and legend. We should therefore expect to find that the association between Zeus and Hermes indicated in Acts belonged to the religious system of the native population, rather than to that of the educated society of the colony. And this is precisely the character of the cult illustrated in our two inscriptions. It is essentially a native cult, under a thin Gr disguise. The names in those inscriptions can only have been the names of natives; the Zeus and Hermes of Acts and of our inscriptions were a graecized version of the Father-god and Son-god of the native Anatolian system. The college of priests which appears in inscription no. 1 (supporting the Bezan variant "priests" for "priest" in Acts 14 13) was a regular Anatolian institution. The miracle performed by Paul, and his companionship with Barnabas would naturally suggest to the natives who used the "speech of Lycaonia" a pair of gods commonly associated by them in a local cult. The two gods whose names rose to their lips are now known to have been associated by the dedication of a statue of one in a temple, of the other in the neighborhood of L.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, mā'a-ka (מַאכָה, ma'akhāh):

(1) B, Μοχά, Mochá, A, Μωχά, Mōchá, daughter of Nahor, borne to him by Reumah (Gen 22 24).

(2) B, Μααχά, Maachá, A, Μααχάθ, Maacháth, the one wife of David who was of royal rank, the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, who became the mother of Absalom (2 S 3 3; 1 Ch 3 2).

(3) Μααχά, Maachá, father of Achish, king of Gath (1 K 2 39). He is probably referred to as "Maach" in 1 S 27 2.

(4) The daughter of Absalom, the favorite wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (1 K 15 2; 2 Ch 11 20, etc.). Evidently "daughter" must here be understood as "granddaughter," according to a common oriental usage. Tamar was the only daughter of Absalom. If Tamar married Uriel of Gibeah (2 Ch 13 2), then Maacah was her daughter. In that case the name Micaiah in this passage would be either a copyist's error or a variant of Maacah. She must have been a woman of strong personality. Unfortunately her influence was cast upon the side of idolatry. She maintained her position in the palace, however, till the reign of her grandson Asa. Possibly she acted as regent during his minority. Ultimately she was degraded by him for an act of peculiar infamy (1 K 15 13; 2 Ch 15 16).

(5) Concubine of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Ch 2 48).

(6) Sister of Huphim and Shuphim the Benjamites, who became the wife of Machir the Manassite, the "father" of Gilead (1 Ch 7 12, 15f).

(7) Wife of Jeiel, the "father" of Gibeon, an ancestress of King Saul (1 Ch 8 29; 9 35).

(8) Father of Hanan, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 43).

(9) Father of Shephatiah, ruler of the Simeonites under David (1 Ch 27 16). W. EWING

MAACAH, mā'a-ka (מַאכָה, ma'akhāh; B, Μωχά, Mōchá, A, Μααχά, Maachá): A small Syrian kingdom adjoining that of Geshur on the western border of Bashan, the inhabitants of which are called Maacathites (RV "Maacathites"), whose territory was taken by Jair (Dt 3 14; Josh 12 5). The border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites and all Mt. Hermon were given to the half-tribe of Manassah (Josh 13 11). The inhabitants of these kingdoms, however, were not driven out by Israel (ver 13), and at a later day the children of Ammon hired mercenaries from Maacah for their encounter with David. The armies met near Medeba when the "Syrians" from Maacah found themselves opposed to Joab. That famous captain completely routed them (2 S 10 6 ff, LXX "Amalek"). In 1 Ch 19 6 it is called Aram-maacah, Syria-maacah (AV); and in 1 Ch 2 23 "Aram" appears instead of "Maacah."

It evidently lay between Geshur on the S. and Hermon on the N., being probably bounded by Jordan on the W., although no certain indication of boundaries is now possible. They would thus be hemmed in by Israel, which accounts for 'Geshur and Maacath dwell in the midst of Israel' (Josh 13 13). It is possible that Abel-beth-maacah may have been a colony founded by men from Maacah. W. EWING

MAACATHITES, mā-ak'a-thīts (מַאכָתִיתִים, ha-ma'akhāthīt; B, δ Μαχαται, ho Machatai, A, Μαχαθ, Machath): Mentioned in Scripture as Ahasbai

(2 S 23 34), Jaazaniah (2 K 25 23), Naham (1 Ch 4 19) and Jezaniah (Jer 40 8). See preceding article.

MAADAI, mā-a-dā'i, mā'a-dī (מַאדַּי, ma'adhay): Son of Bani; one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 34).

MAADIAH, mā-a-dī'a (מַאדִּיָּה, ma'adhyāh, "whose ornament is Jah"): A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 5). The name also occurs in the form "Moadiah" (Neh 12 17).

MAAI, mā-ā'i, mā'ī (מַאִי, mā'ay): An Asaphite musician who took part in the ceremony of the dedication of the walls (Neh 12 36).

MAALEH-ACRABBIM, mā'a-la-a-krab'im, mā'al'a-. See AKRABBIM.

MAANI, mā'a-nī (Μαανι, Maanī):

(1) AV "Meani" (1 Esd 5 31), corresponding to "Meunim" in Ezr 2 50; Neh 7 52.

(2) RV "Baani," head of a family, many of whom had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9 34; called "Bani" in Ezr 10 34).

MAARATH, mā'a-rath (מַאֲרָת, ma'ārāth): A city in the hill country of Judah, mentioned between Gedor and Beth-anoth (Josh 15 59). The small village of Beit Ummar upon the watershed, a little to the W. of the carriage road to Hebron and about a mile from Kh. Jedār (Gedor), is a probable site. There are many rock tombs to its E. The village mosque is dedicated to Nebi Matta, i.e. St. Matthew. See PEF, III, 305, Sh XXI.

MAAREH-GEBA, mā'a-re-gē'ba, -gā'ba (מַאֲרֵה גִבְעָה, ma'ārēh gebha'; B, Μαραγὰβε, Maraγάβε, A, δυσμὸν τῆς Γαβὰδ, dusmōn tēs Gabād): The place where the men of Israel lay in ambush, from which they broke forth upon the children of Benjamin (Jgs 20 33). AV renders "the meadows of Gibeah," RVm "the meadow of Geba [or Gibeah]." LXX A affords a clue to the correct reading. It is not a place-name. The text must be emended to read mimma-ārābh l'gebha', "to the W. of Geba." Pesh suggests a reading mimma-ārāth gebha', "from the cave of Geba." This, however, there is nothing to warrant. W. EWING

MAASAI, mā'a-sī, mā-as'ī (מַאסַּי, ma'say; AV Maasias): A priest, son of Abdid (1 Ch 9 12).

MAASEAS, mā-a-sē'as (Μαασας, Maasatos; AV Maasias): Grandfather of Baruch (Bar 1 1); called Mahseiah in Jer 32 12; 51 59.

MAASEIAH, mā-a-sē'ya, mā-a-sī'a (מַאסִּיָּה, ma'asēyāhū, "Jeh's work"; Μαασαϊά, Maassaiá, and Massatas in LXX): A name common in exilic and late monarchic times (Gray, HPN).

(1) A Levite musician named in connection with David's bringing up of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15 18, 20).

(2) A Levite captain who aided Jehoiada at the coronation of Joash (2 Ch 23 1).

(3) An officer of Uzziah (2 Ch 26 11).

(4) Ahaz' son, slain by the Ephraimite, Zichri (2 Ch 28 7).

(5) A governor of Jerus under Josiah (2 Ch 34 8).

(6) (7) (8) (9) The name of 4 men, 3 of them priests, who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 18.21.22.30).

(10) Father of Azariah, one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3 23).

(11) One of those who stood at Ezra's right hand during the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4).

(12) One of the expounders of the Law (Neh 8 7).

(13) One of those who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 25).

(14) A Judahite inhabitant of Jerus (Neh 11 5), who in 1 Ch 9 5 is called Asaiah.

(15) A Benjamite (Neh 11 7).

(16) (17) Name of two priests (Neh 12 41 f).

(18) A priest in Zedekiah's reign, father of a certain Zephaniah who interviewed the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 21 1; 29 25; 37 3).

(19) Father of the false prophet Zedekiah (Jer 29 21).

(20) A keeper of the threshold in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 35 4).

(21) Baaseiah (q.v.), a Kohathite name (1 Ch 6 40), is probably a textual error for Maaseiah.

(22) AV for Mahseiah, an ancestor of Baruch (Jer 32 12).

MAASMAS, mā-as'mas, mā-as-mas (Μασμᾶς, Maasmās; Swete reads Maasmān; AV Masman, 1 Esd 8 43): Corresponds to "Shemaiah" in Ezr 8 16.

MAATH, mā'ath (Μαάθ, Maáth): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 12th generation before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 26).

MAAZ, mā'az (מַאֲזַר, ma'az): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 27).

MAAZIAH, mā-a-zī'a (מַאֲזִיָּהוּ, ma'azyāhū):

(1) The priest to whom fell the lot for the 24th course (1 Ch 24 18).

(2) One of those who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 8).

LITERATURE

The name Maccabaeus was first applied to Judas, one of the sons of Mattathias generally called in Eng. the Maccabees, a celebrated family who defended Jewish rights and customs in the 2d cent. BC (1 Macc 2 1-3). The word has been variously derived (e.g. as the initial letters of Mi Khā- mōkhā, Bā'ēlim Yahweh! "Who is like unto thee among the mighty, O Jeh?"), but it is probably best associated with makkābhāh, "hammer," and as applied to Judas may be compared with the malleus Scotorum and malleus haereticorum of the Middle Ages (see next article). To understand the work of the Maccabees, it is necessary to take note of the relation in which the Jews and Pal stood at the time to the immediately neighboring nations.

I. Palestine under Kings of Syria.—On the division of Alexander's empire at his death in the year 323 BC, Pal became a sort of

1. Rivalry of Syria and Egypt buffer state between Egypt under the Ptolemies on the S., and Syria, under the house of Seleucus, the last survivor of Alexander's generals, on the N.

The kings of Syria, as the Seleucid kings are generally called, though their dominion extended practically from the Mediterranean Sea to India, had not all the same name, like the Ptolemies of Egypt, though most of them were called either Seleucus or Antiochus. For a hundred years after the death of Alexander, the struggle went on as to which of the two powers was to govern Pal, until in the year 223 came the northern prince under whom Pal was destined to fall to the Seleucids for good.

This was Antiochus III, commonly known as Antiochus the Great. He waged two campaigns against Egypt for the possession of

2. Palestine Pal, finally gaining the upper hand in the year 198 BC by his victory at Seized by Antiochus the Great Panium, so called from its proximity to a sanctuary of the god Pan, a spot close to the sources of the Jordan and still called Banias. The Jews helped Antiochus to gain the victory and, according to Jos, his rule was accepted by the Jews with good will. It is with him and his successors that the Jews have now to deal.

Antiochus, it should be noticed, came in contact with the Romans after their conquest of Macedonia in 197, and was defeated by Scipio Asiaticus at Magnesia in 190. He came under heavy tribute which he found it difficult to pay, and met his end in 187, while plundering a Gr temple in order to secure its contents. His son and successor Seleucus IV was murdered by his prime minister Heliodorus in 176-175 BC, who reaped no benefit from his crime.

The brother of the murdered king succeeded to the throne as Antiochus IV, generally known as

3. Accession of Antiochus Epiphanes Antiochus Epiphanes ("the Illustrious"), a typical eastern ruler of considerable practical ability, but whose early training while a hostage at Rome had made him an adept in dissimulation. Educated in the fashionable Hellenism of the day, he made it his aim during his reign (175-164 BC) to enforce it upon his empire, a policy which brought him into conflict with the Jews. Even before his reign many Jews had yielded to the attraction of Gr thought and custom, and the accession of a ruler like Antiochus Epiphanes greatly increased the drift in that direction, as will be found described in the article dealing with the period between the Old and the New Testaments (see BETWEEN THE TESTAMENTS). Pious Jews meanwhile, men faithful to the Jewish tradition, Chāsīdīm (see HASIDAEANS), as they were called, resisted this tendency, and in the end were driven to armed resistance against the severe oppression practised by Antiochus in advancing his Hellenizing views. See ASMONEANS.

II. Palestine under the Maccabees.—Mattathias, a priest of the first 24 courses and therefore of the noblest who dwelt at Modin, a city of Judah, was the first to strike a blow. With his own hand he slew a Jew at Modin who was willing to offer the idolatrous sacrifices ordered by the king, and also Apelles, the leader of the

1. Mattathias who dwelt at Modin, a city of Judah, was the first to strike a blow. With his own hand he slew a Jew at Modin who was willing to offer the idolatrous sacrifices ordered by the king, and also Apelles, the leader of the king's messengers (1 Macc 2 15-28). He fled with his sons to the mountains (168 BC), where he organized a successful resistance; but being of advanced age and unfit for the fatigue of active service, he died in 166 BC and was buried "in the sepulchres of his fathers" at Modin (1 Macc 2 70; Jos, Ant, XII, vi, 3). He apparently named as his successor his 3d son, Judas, though it was with real insight that on his deathbed he recommended the four brothers to take Simon as their counsellor (1 Macc 2 65).

Judas, commonly called Judas Maccabaeus—often called in 2 Macc "Judas the Maccabee"—held strongly the opinions of his father and proved at least a very capable leader in guerilla warfare. He defeated several of the generals of Antiochus—Apollonius at Beth-horon, part of the army of Lysias at Emmaus (166 BC), and Lysias himself at Bethsura the following year. He took possession of Jerus, except the "Tower," where he was subsequently besieged and hard pressed by Lysias and the young king Antiochus Eupator in 163 BC; but quarrels among the Syrian generals secured relief and liberty of religion to the Jews which, however, proved of short duration. The Hellenizing Jews, with ALCIAS (q.v.) at their head, secured the favor of the king, who sent Nicanor against Judas. The victory over Nicanor first at Capharsalama and later (161 BC) at Adasa near Beth-horon, in which engagement Nicanor was slain, was the greatest of Judas' successes and practically secured the independence of the Jews. The attempt of Judas to negotiate an alliance with the Romans, who had now serious interests in these regions, caused much dissatisfaction among his followers; and their defection at Elasa (161 BC), during the invasion under Bacchides, which was undertaken before the answer of the Rom Senate arrived, was the cause of the defeat and death of Judas in battle. His body was buried "in the sepulchres of his fathers" at Modin. There is no proof that Judas held the office of high priest like his father Mattathias. (An interesting and not altogether favorable estimate of Judas and of the spiritual import of the revolt will be found in Jerusalem under the High Priests, 97-99, by E. R. Bevan, London, 1904.)

Jonathan (called Apphus, "the wary"), the youngest of the sons of Mattathias, succeeded Judas, whose defeat and death had left the patriotic party in a deplorable condition from which it was rescued by the skill and ability of Jonathan, aided largely by the rivalries among the competitors for the Syrian throne. It was in reality from these rivalries that resulted the 65 years (129-64 BC) of the completely independent rule of the Hasmonaean dynasty (see ASMONEANS) that elapsed between the Gr supremacy of the Syrian kings and the Rom supremacy established by Pompey. The first step toward the recovery of the patriots was the permission granted them by Demetrius I to return to Judaea in 158 BC—the year in which Bacchides ended an unsuccessful campaign against Jonathan and in fact accepted the terms of the latter. After his departure, Jonathan "judged the people at Michmash" (1 Macc 9 73). Jonathan was even authorized to reënter Jerus and to maintain a military force, only the "Tower" the 'Akra, as it was called in Gr, being held by a Syrian garrison. See further under ASMONEANS; LACEDAEMONIANS; TRYPHON.

Simon, surnamed Thassi ("the zealous"?) was now the only surviving member of the original Maccabean family, and he readily took up the inheritance. Tryphon murdered the boy-king Antiochus Dionysus and seized the throne of Seleucus, although having no connection with the Seleucid family. Simon accordingly broke entirely with Tryphon after making successful overtures to Demetrius, who granted the fullest immunity from all the dues that had marked the Seleucid supremacy. Even the golden crown, which had to be paid on the investiture of a new high priest, was now remitted. On the 23d of Iijar (May), 141, the patriots entered even the 'Akra "with praise and palm branches, and with harps, and with cymbals and with viols, and with hymns, and with songs" (1 Macc 13 51). Simon was declared in a Jewish assembly to be high priest and chief of the people "for ever, until there should arise a prophet worthy of credence" (1 Macc 14 41), a limitation that was felt to be necessary on account of the departure of the people from the Divine appointment of the high priests of the old line and one that practically perpetuated the high-priesthood in the family of Simon. Even a new era was started, of which the high-priesthood of Simon was to be year 1, and this was really the foundation of the Hasmonaean dynasty (see ASMONEANS).

John Hyrcanus, one of the sons of Simon, escaped from the plot laid by Ptolemy, and succeeded his father, both as prince and high priest. See ASMONEANS. He was succeeded (104 BC) by his son Aristobulus I who took the final step of assuming the title of king.

Two members of the first generation of the Maccabean family still remain to be mentioned: (1) John, the eldest, surnamed Gaddis (AV "Caddis"), probably meaning "my fortune," was murdered by a marauding tribe, the sons of 6. John JAMBRI (q.v.), near Medeba, on the and Eleazar E. of the Jordan, when engaged upon the convoy of some property of the Maccabees to the friendly country of the Nabataeans (1 Macc 9 35-42). (2) Eleazar, surnamed Avaran, met his death (161 BC) in the early stage of the Syrian war, shortly before the death of Judas. In the battle of Bethzacharias (163 BC), in which the Jews for the first time met elephants in war, he stabbed from below the elephant on which he supposed the young king was riding. He killed the elephant but he was himself crushed to death by its fall (1 Macc 6 43-46). For the further history of the Hasmonaean dynasty, see ASMONEANS; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.

LITERATURE.—There is a copious literature on the Maccabees, a family to which history shows few, if any, parallels of such united devotion to a sacred cause. The main authorities are of course the Maccabean Books of the Apocrypha; but special reference may be made to the chapters of Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, dealing with the subject, and to E. R. Bevan, Jerusalem under the High Priests, 1904, or to the 2d vol of House of Seleucus by the same author, 1902.

LITERATURE

I. 1 Maccabees.—The Heb title has perished with the original Heb text. Rabbinical writers call the Books of Macc ספרי החשמונאים,

1. Name šiph'rē ha-ḥashmōnīm, "The Book of the Hasmonaean" (see ASMONEANS). Origen gives to Book I (the only one he seemed to know of) the name Σαββήθ Σαβαταίελ, Sabbēth Sabatāiēl, evidently a Heb or Aram. name of very uncertain meaning, but which Dalman (Aram. Gram., § 6) explains as a corruption of Aram. words="The Book of the House of the Hasmonians" (cf the rabbinical name given above). In the Gr MSS N, AV (Cod. Venetus), the 4 books go under the designation Μακκαβαίων, Makkabatōn, Α Β Γ Δ, βιβλος, biblos, being understood. In the Vulg the 1st and 2d books are alone found, and appear under the name Machabaeorum liber primus, secundus. The spelling Machabaeorum reproduces probably the pronunciation current in Jerome's day.

The name "Maccabee" belongs strictly only to Judas, who in 2 Macc is usually called "the Maccabee" (δ Μακκαβαίος, ho Makkabaios). But the epithet came to be applied to the whole family and their descendants. The word means probably "extinguisher" (of persecution) (מַכְבִּי, makhbi, from kābhāh, "to be extinguished"; so Niese; Jos, Ant, XII, vi, 1 f; S. J. Curtis, The Name Maccabee). The more usual explanation, "hammerer" (מַכְבֵּי, makkābhay), is untenable, as the noun from which it is derived (מַכְבֶּתֶת, makkēbhet) (Jgs 4 21) denotes a smith's hammer.

Since the Vulg includes only the first 2 books of Macc, these are the only books pronounced canonical by the Council of Trent and included in recognized Protestant VSS of the Apoc (see APOCRYPHA). That 1 Macc was used largely in the early Christian church is proved by the numerous references made to it and quotations from it in the writings of Tertullian (d. 220), Clement of Alexandria (d. 220), Hippolytus (d. 235), Origen (d. 254), etc. The last named states that 1 Macc is uncanonical, and it is excluded from the lists of canonical writings given by Athanasius (d. 373), Cyril of Jerus (d. 386), and Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390). Indeed, none of the books of the Macc was recognized as canonical until the Council of Trent (1553) gave this rank to the first 2 books, and Protestants continue in their confessions to exclude the whole of the Apoc from the Bible proper, though Luther maintained that 1 Macc was more worthy of a place in the Canon than many books now included in it.

1 Macc gives first of all a brief view of the reign of Alexander the Great and the partition of his kingdom among his successors. Having thus explained the origin of the Seleucid Dynasty, the author proceeds to give a history of the Jews from the accession of Antiochus IV.

3. Contents king of Syria (175 BC), to the death of Simon (135 BC). The events of these 40 years are simply but graphically related and almost entirely in the order of their occurrence. The contents of 1 Macc and 2 Macc 4-15 are in the main parallel, dealing with the same incidents; but the simple narrative character of 1 Macc, in contrast to the didactic and highly religious as well as supernatural coloring of 2 Macc, can easily be seen in these corresponding parts. The victories due to heroism in 1 Macc are commonly ascribed to miraculous intervention on the part of God in 2 Macc (see 1 Macc 4 1 f; cf 2 Macc 8 23 f). 2 Macc is more given to exaggerations. The army of Judas at Bethsura consists of 10,000 according to 1 Macc 4 29, but of 80,000 according to 2 Macc 11 2. The following is a brief analysis of 1 Macc:

(1) 1 1-10: An account of the rise of the Seleucid Dynasty.

(2) 1 11-16 24: History of the Jews from 175 to 135 BC.

(a) 1 11-64: Introductory. Some Jews inclined to adopt Gr customs (religious, etc); Antiochus' aim to conquer Egypt and to suppress the Jewish religion as a source of Jewish disloyalty. Desecration of the Jewish temple: martyrdom of many faithful Jews.

(b) 2 1-70: The revolt of Mattathias.

(c) 3 1-9 22: Leadership of Judas Maccabaeus after his father's death. Brilliant victories over the Syrians. Purification of the temple. Death of Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) and accession of Antiochus V (Eupator) (164 BC). Demetrius I became king of Syria, and Alcimus Jewish high priest (162 BC). Treaty between Jews and Romans. Defeat of Jews at Eleasa and death of Judas Maccabaeus (161 BC).

(d) 9 23-12 53: Leadership of Jonathan, 5th son of Mattathias, elected to succeed his brother Judas. He becomes high priest. Political independence of Judaea secured.

(e) 13 31-16 24: Peaceful and prosperous rule of Simon, brother of Jonathan; accession of his son John Hyrcanus (135 BC).

That the author of 1 Macc aims at giving a correct narrative, and that on the whole his account is correct, is the opinion of practically all scholars. The simple, straightforward way in which he writes inspires confidence, and there can be no doubt that we have here a first-class authority for the period covered (175-135 BC). It is the earliest Jewish history which dates events in reference to a definite era, this era being that of the Seleucids, 312 BC, the year of the founding of that dynasty. The aid received from God is frequently recognized in the book (2 51 f; 3 18; 4 10 f; 9 46; 16 3), yet it is mainly through personal valor that the Jews conquer, not, as in 2 Macc (see III, 3 below), through miraculous Divine interpositions. Ordinary, secondary causes are almost the only ones taken into account, so that the record may be relied upon as on the whole trustworthy. Yet the writer shows the defects which belong to his age and environment, or what from the standpoint of literal history must be counted defects, though, as in the case of 2 Macc (cf Ch), a writer may have other aims than to record bare objective facts. In 1 1-9 the author errs through ignorance of the real facts as regards Alexander's partition of his kingdom; and other misstatements of fact due to the same cause occur in 10 1 f (Alexander [Balas], son of Antiochus Epiphanes) and in 13 31 f (time of assassination of Antiochus VI by Tryphon). In 6 37 it is said there were 32 men upon each elephant, perhaps a misreading of the original "2 or 3," although the Indian elephant corps of today carry more.

We know nothing of a Pers village Elymais (6 1). The number of Jewish warriors that fought and the number slain are understated, while there are evident exaggerations of the number of soldiers who fought against them and of those of them who were left dead on the field (see 4 15; 7 46; 11 45-51, etc).

But in this book, prayers, speeches and official records abound as they do in Ezra, Nehemiah (see Century Bible, "Ezr," "Neh," "Est," 12 f), and many modern Protestant writers doubt or deny the authenticity of a part of those, though that is not necessarily to question their genuineness as part of the original narrative.

As regards the prayers (3 50-54; 4 30-33) and speeches (2 7-13; 2 50-68; 4 6-11, etc), there is no valid reason for doubting that they give at least the substance of what was originally said or written, though ancient historians like Thucydides and Livy think it quite right to edit the speeches of their characters, abbreviating, expanding or altering. Besides, it is to be remembered that the art of stenography is a modern one; even Dr. Johnson, in default of verbatim reports, had to a large extent to make the speeches which he ostensibly reported.

There is, however, in the book a large number of official documents, and it is in regard to the authenticity of these that modern criticism has expressed greatest doubt. They are the following:

- (1) Letter of the Jews in Gilead to Judas (5 10-13).
- (2) Treaty of alliance between the Romans and Jews; copy written on brass tablets sent to Judas (8 22-32).
- (3) Letter from King Alexander Balas to Jonathan (10 18-20).
- (4) Letter from King Demetrius I to Jonathan (10 25-45).
- (5) Letter from King Demetrius II to Jonathan (11 30-37), together with letter to Lathenes (11 31-37).
- (6) Letter from the young prince Antiochus to Jonathan, making the latter high priest (11 57).
- (7) Letter from Jonathan to the Spartans, asking for an alliance (12 5-18).
- (8) Earlier letter of the Spartan king Arius to the high priest Onias (12 20-23).
- (9) Letter from King Demetrius II to Simon (13 36-40).

- (10) Letter from the Spartans to Simon (14 20-24).
 (11) A decree of the Jews recognizing the services of Simon and his brothers (14 27-45).
 (12) Letters from Antiochus VII (Sidetes) to Simon (15 2-9).
 (13) Message from the Rom consul Lucius to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, asking protection for the Jews (15 16-21). A copy was sent to Simon (15 24).

Formerly the authenticity of these state documents was accepted without doubt, as they are still by Romanist commentators (Welte, Scholz, etc.). At most they are but translations of translations, for the originals would be written in Gr and Lat, from which the author would translate into Heb. The Gr of our book is a tr from the Heb (see II, 8 below).

Rawlinson (Speaker's Apoc, II, 329) says these documents "have a general air of authenticity." Most modern scholars reject the letters purporting to emanate from the Romans (nos. 2 and 13 above) and from the Spartans (nos. 8, 10 above), together with Jonathan's message to the latter (no. 7, above), on the ground that they contain some historical inaccuracies and imply others. How could one consul issue official mandates in the name of the Rom republic (see no. 13, above)? In no. 8 above, it is the king of the Spartans who writes on behalf of his people to Onias the high priest; but it is the ephoroi or rulers who write for the Spartans to Simon. Why the difference? Moreover, in 12 21 the Spartans and Jews are said to be kinsmen (lit. brothers), both alike being descendants of Abraham; so also 14 20. This is admittedly contrary to fact. For a careful examination of these official documents and their objective value, see Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen des AT, 27-30. Though, however, these documents and some others can be proved incorrect as they stand, they do seem to imply actual negotiations of the kind described; i.e. the Jews must have had communications with the Romans and Spartans, the Jews of Gilead must have sent a missive to Judas (no. 1), Alexander Balas did no doubt write to Jonathan, etc, though the author of 1 Macc puts the matter in his own way, coloring it by his own patriotic and religious prejudices.

Though the name of the author is unknown, the book itself supplies conclusive evidence that he belonged to the Sadducee party, the

5. Author's Standpoint and Aim The aim of the writer is evidently historical and patriotic, yet his attitude toward religious questions is clearly indicated, both directly and indirectly.

(1) Nowhere in the book is the Divine Being mentioned under any name except Heaven (3 18 f. 50.60; 4 10.55; 12 15, etc), a designation common in rabbinical Heb (Talm, etc). As early as 300 BC the sacred name "Yahwe" was discarded in favor of "Adonai" (Lord) for superstitious reasons. But in 1 Macc no strictly Divine name meets us at all. This would seem to suggest the idea of a certain aloofness of God, such as characterized the theology of the Sadducee party. Contrast with this the mystic closeness of God realized and expressed by the psalmists and prophets of the OT.

(2) The author is a religious patriot, believing that his people have been Divinely chosen and that the cause of Israel is the cause of God.

(3) He is also a strict legalist, believing it the duty of every Jew to keep the Law and to preserve its institutions (1 11.15.43.49.54.60.62 f; 2 20 f. 27.42.48.50; 3 21, etc), and deprecating attempts to compel Jews to desecrate the Sabbath and feast days (1 45), to eat unclean food (1 63) and to sacrifice to idols (1 43). Yet the comparatively lax attitude toward the Sabbath implied in 2 41 f, involving the principle of Christ's words, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath" (Mk 2 27), agrees with the Sadducee position against that of the Pharisees.

(4) The book teaches that the age of inspiration is past, and that the sacred books already written are the only source of comfort in sorrow and of encouragement under difficulties (12 9).

(5) The legitimacy of the high-priesthood of Simon is not once questioned, though it is condemned by both the Deuteronomic law (D), which restricts the priesthood to the tribe of Levi, and by the priestly law (P), which requires in addition that a priest must be of the family of Aaron. This laxity agrees well with the general tenets of the Sadducees.

(6) The book contains no trace of the Messianic hope, though it was entertained at the time in other circles (the Pharisees; see MESSIAH, II, 2; PROPHECY); 2 57 is no exception, for it implies no more than a belief that there would be a restoration of the Davidic Dynasty. Perhaps it is implied that that expectation was realized in the Hasmoneans.

(7) There is no reference in the book to the doctrine of a resurrection from the dead or to that of the immortality of the soul, though we know that both these beliefs were commonly held by Jews of the time (see Dnl 12 3; En 1 9; 22 11-14; 9 1.5 ff; 2 Macc 7 9.11.14.29). We know that the Pharisee party believed in a resurrection (see Acts 23 6). The Maccabean heroes fought their battles and faced death without fear, not because, like Moslems, they looked to the rewards of another life, but because they believed in the rightness of their cause and coveted the good name won by their fathers by acts of similar courage and devotion.

This outline of the doctrines taught or implied in the book makes it extremely likely that the author was a member of the Sadducee party.

1 Macc must have been written before the Rom conquest under Pompey, since the writer speaks of the Romans as allies and even friends (8 1.12; 12 1; 14 40); i.e. the composition of the book must have been completed (unless we except chs 14-16; see below) before 63 BC, when Pompey conquered Jerus. and Judaea became a Rom province. We thus get 63 BC as a terminus ad quem. Moreover, the historical narrative is brought down to the death of Simon (16 16), i.e. to 135 BC. We have thus an undoubted terminus a quo in 135 BC. The book belongs for certain to the period between 135 and 63 BC. But 16 18-24 implies that John Hyrcanus (d. 105 BC) had for some time acted as successor to Simon, and Reuss, Ewald, Fritzsche, Grimm, Schürer, Kautzsch, etc, are probably right in concluding from 16 23 f that John was dead when the book was completed, for we have in this verse the usual formula recording the close of a royal career (see 1 K 11 41; 2 K 10 34, etc), and the writer makes it sufficiently understood that all his acts were already "entered in the public annals of the kingdom" (Ewald, History of Israel, V, 463, n.), so that repetition was unnecessary. But Bertheau, Keil, Wellhausen and Torrey draw the contrary conclusion, arguing that John had but begun his rule, so that at the time of writing there was practically nothing to record of the doings subsequent to 135, when John succeeded Simon (see EB, III, 2860 [Toy]). In 13 30 we read that the monument erected in 143 BC by Simon in memory of his father and brothers was standing at the time when this book was written, words implying the lapse of say 30 years at least. This gives a terminus a quo of 113 BC. Moreover, the panegyric on Simon (d. 135 BC) and his peaceful rule in 14 4-15 leaves the impression that he had been long in his grave. We cannot be far wrong in assigning a date for the book in the early part of the last cent. BC, say 80 BC.

Destinon (Die Quellen des Flavius Jos, I, 1882, 80 ff), followed by Wellhausen (IJG, 1894, 222 f), maintained that Jos (d. c 95), who followed 1 Macc up to the end of ch 13, could not have seen chs 14-16 (or from 14 16?), or he would not have given so meager an account of the high-priesthood of Simon (see Ant, XIII, vi, 7), which the author of 1 Macc describes so fully in those chapters. But Jos must have used these chapters or he could not have written of Simon even as fully as he does.

If, as Torrey (EB, III, 2362) holds, we have in 1 Macc "the account of one who had witnessed the whole Maccabean struggle from its be-

7. Sources ginning," the book having been completed soon after the middle of the 2d cent. BC, it may then be assumed that the writer depended upon no other sources than his own. But even in this case one is compelled, contrary to Torrey (i.e.), to assume that written sources of his own were used, or the descriptions would not have been so full and the dating so exact. If, however, we follow the evidence and bring down the date of the book to about 80 BC (see I, 6), it must be supposed that the author had access to written sources. It may legitimately be inferred from 9 22 and 16 23 and from the habit of earlier times (see Century Bible, "Ezr," etc, 11 ff) that official records were kept in the archives of the temple, or elsewhere. These might have contained the state documents referred to in I, 4, some or all, and reports of speeches and prayers, etc. It must be admitted that, unlike the compilers of the historical books of the OT (S, K, Ch, etc), the author of 1 Macc does not definitely name his written sources. The writer might well be supposed to have kept a kind of diary of his own in which the events of his own early life were recorded. Oral tradition, much more retentive of songs, speeches and the like in ancient than in modern times, must have been a very important source.

We have the testimony of Origen (see I, 1) and Jerome (Prolog. Galeatus) that the book existed in Heb in their day. But it is doubtful 8. Original whether the words of Origen imply a Language Heb or an Aram. original, and though Jerome does speak of the book as Heb (hebraicus), it has to be remembered that in later times the Gr adj. denoting Heb (ἑβραϊστὶ, hebraïsti) and perhaps the corresponding Lat one (hebraicus) denoted often Palestinian Aram. (see Jgs 5 2; 19 13.17; and Kautzsch, Grammatik des bib. Aram., 19).

Hebraisms (or Aramaisms?) abound throughout the book. In the following examples Hebraisms are literally rendered in Gr, though in the latter language they are unidiomatic and often unintelligible: "two years of days"=two full years (1 29, etc); "month and month"=every month (1 58); "a man [or each one] his neighbor"=each . . . the other (2 40; 3 43); "sons of the fortress"=occupants of the fortress (4 2); "against our face"=before us (4 10); "men of power"=warriors (5 32); "of them"=some of them (6 2; cf 7 33, "of the priests"=some of the priests); "the right hand wing"=the southern wing (9 1); "yesterday and the third day"=hitherto (9 44). The above are strictly Hebraisms and not for the most part Aramaisms. The implied use of the "waw-consecutive" in 3 1.41; 8 1; 9 1, and often, points also to a Heb, not to an Aram. origin. "Heaven" as a substitute for "God," so common in this book (see I, 5), is perhaps as much an Aramaism as a Hebraism (see Tg Jerus Nu 25 19). Many of the proper names in the book are obviously but transliterations from the Heb; thus Φυλιστιν, Philistin (3 24); cf Sir 46 18; 47 7; see the names in 11 34; and Schürer, GJV, I, 233.

The original Heb text of 1 Macc (see I, 8) must have been lost at a very early time, since we have no evidence of its use by any early writer. J. D.

9. Text and Versions Michaelis held that Jos used it, but this idea has been abandoned in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

The Heb text of the first half of 1 Macc, edited by A. Schweizer and taken by him to be a part of the original text, is in reality a tr from the Lat made in the 11th cent. of our era (so Nöldeke, etc).

(1) Greek.—The Gr text from which the other VSS are nearly all made is given in all edd of the LXX. It occurs in the uncials  $\Sigma$  (Fritzsch, X), A (Fritzsch, III), and V (8th or 9th cent.), not in B; and in a large number of cursives. Swete (OT in Gr) gives the text of A with the variations of  $\Sigma$  and V. Though the Gr text has so many Hebraisms, it is an exceedingly good rendering, full of spirit and on the whole more idiomatic than the rest of the LXX.

(2) Latin.—There are two Lat recensions of the book: (a) that found in the Vulg, which agrees almost entirely with the Old Lat VS. It is in the main a literal rendering of the Gr. (b) Sabatier (Bibliotheca sacrorum Latinae versiones antiquae, II) published in 1743 a Lat VS of chs 1-13 found in but one MS (Sangermanensis). Though it is evidently made from the Gr it differs at many points from the Vulg. It is probably older than the Old Lat and therefore than the Vulg.

(3) Syriac.—There are also two varying texts in this language. (a) The best known is that printed in the Paris Polyglot (vol IX), compiled with some changes into the London Polyglot (vol IV; for readings see vol V). Lagarde (Lib. V. Test. Apoc. Syr., 1861) has edited this VS, correcting and appending readings. (b) A text differing in many respects from (a) is given by Ceriani in his Cod. Ambros. of the Pesh (1876-83), though this also is made from the Gr. For a careful collection of both the above Syr texts by G. Schmidt, see ZATW, 1897, 1-47, 233-62.

LITERATURE.—See literature cited in the foregoing material. For texts and comms. on the Apoc, see Apocrypha. The following comms. deserve special mention: Grimm, Kurz. exeg. Handbuch, etc, to which the comms. by Keil (1 and 2 Macc) and Bissel (Lange) owe very much; Kautzsch, Die Apoc des AT; W. Fairweather and J. S. Black, Cambridge Bible, "1 Macc." and Oesterley in the Oxford Apoc edited by R. H. Charles (1913). Of the dict. arts. those in EB (Torrey) and ADB (Fairweather) are excellent. See also E. Montet, Essai sur les origines des saducéens et des pharisiens, 1885; Wibrich, Juden und Griechen vor der mak. Erhebung, 1875, 69-76; B. Niese, Kritik der beiden Makkabäerbücher, 1900. For a very full bibliography see Schürer, GJV, III, 198 ff, and his art. "Apocrypha" in RE, and in Sch-Herz.

II. 2 Maccabees.—See I, above. The earliest extant mention of the book as 2 Macc is in Euseb.,

Praep. Evang., VIII, 9. Jerome also (Prol. Galeatus) calls it by this name.

1. Name In the early church 2 Macc was much less valued and therefore less read than 1 Macc. Augustine was the only church Father to

2. Canon-claim for it canonical rank and even he, in a controversy with the Donatists who quoted 2 Macc, replied that this icity book had never been received into the Canon. Since they formed an integral part of the Vulg, 1 and 2 Macc were both recognized by the Council of Trent as belonging to the Romanist Canon.

(1) 1-2 18: Two letters from the Jews of Jerus to their brethren in Egypt, urging them to keep the Feast of Dedication and in a general way to observe the Law given them by God through Moses. Both letters appear designed to win for the Jerus temple the love and devotion which the Jews of Egypt were in danger of lavishing upon the Leontopolis temple in Egypt. These letters have no connection with the rest of the book or with each other, and both are undoubted forgeries. There can be no doubt that 2 Macc was first of all composed, and that subsequently either the author or a later hand prefixed these letters on account of their affinity in thought to the book as it first existed. See further on these letters II, 4 and 9.

3. Contents

(2) 2 19-32: Introduction to what follows. The author or epitomizer claims that his history (ch 3 to end of the book) is an epitome in one book of a larger work in 5 books by Jason of Cyrene. But see II, 4, below.

(3) 3 1-15 39 (end of book): History of the rise and progress of the Maccabean wars from 176 BC, to the closing year of the reign of Seleucus IV Philopator, to the defeat and death of Nicanor in 161 BC, a period of 15 years. The record in 2 Macc begins one year earlier than that of 1 Macc, but as the latter reaches down to 135 BC (and probably below 105 BC; see I, 5). 1 Macc covers a period of at least 40 years, while 2 Macc gives the history of but 15 years (176-161 BC). The history of this period is thus treated: (a) 3 1-4 6: Traitorous conduct of the Benjamite Simon in regard to the temple treasures and the high priest; futile attempt of Heliodorus, prime minister of Seleucus IV, to rob the temple (see I, 3, [11] above); (b) 4 7-7 42 || 1 Macc 1 10-64, with significant variations and additions. Accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 BC); the Hellenizing of some Jews; persecution of the faithful; martyrdom of Eleazar and the 7 brethren and their mother (this last not in 1 Macc); (c) chs 8-15 (end) || 1 Macc 3-7, with significant divergences in details. Rise and development of the Maccabean revolt (see I, 3, above). In the closing verses (15 38 ff) the writer begs that his composition may be received with consideration.

The record of events in 2 Macc ends with the brilliant victory of Judas over Nicanor, followed by the death of the latter; but it is strange that the history of the main hero of the book should be dropped in the middle. Perhaps this abrupt ending is due to the writer's aim to commend to the Jews of Egypt the two new festivals, both connected with the Jerus temple. (a) Hanukkah (Festival of Dedication) (1 9, 18; 2 16; 10 8); (b) Nicanor Day (15 36), to commemorate the defeat and death of Nicanor. To end the book with the account of the institution of the latter gives it greater prominence.

In its present form 2 Macc is based ostensibly on two kinds of written sources.

(1) In 2 19-32 the writer of 3 1 to 4. Sources the end, which constitutes the book proper, says that his own work is but an epitome, clearly, artistically and attractively set out, of a larger history by one Jason of Cyrene. Most commentators understand this statement literally, and endeavor to distinguish between the parts due to Jason and those due to the epitomizer. Some think they see endings of the 5 books reflected in the summaries at 3 40; 7 42; 10 9; 13 26; 15 37. But W. H. Kusters gives cogent reasons for concluding that the reference to Jason is but a literary device to secure for his own composition the respect accorded in ancient, as in a lesser degree in modern, times to tradition. The so-called "epitomizer" is in that case alone responsible for the history he gives. The present writer has no hesitation in accepting these conclusions. We read nowhere else of a historian called "Jason," or of such a large history as his must have been if it extended to 5 books dealing with the events of 15 years, though such a man and so great a work could hardly have escaped notice. Hitzig (Gesch. des Volkes Israels, II, 415) held that Jason or his supposed epitomizer made use of 1 Macc, altering, adding and subtracting to suit his purpose. But the different order of the events and the contradictions in statements of facts in the 2 books, as well as the omission from 2 Macc of important items found in 1 Macc, make Hitzig's supposition quite untenable. A careful examination of 2 Macc has led Grimm, Schürer, Zöckler, Wibrich, Cornill, Torrey and others to the conclusion that the author depended wholly upon oral tradition. This gives the best clue to the anachronisms, inconsistencies and loose phrasing which characterize the book. According to 1 Macc 4 26-33, the first campaign of Lysias into Judaea took place in 165 BC, the year before the death of Antiochus IV; but 2 Macc 11 tells us that it occurred in 163 BC, i.e. subsequent to the death of Antiochus IV. Moreover, in the latter passage this 1st expedition of Lysias is connected with the grant of freedom to the Jews, which is really an incident of the 2d expedition, and in 13 1-24 is rightly mentioned in the account of the 2d expedition. The writer of 2 Macc, relying upon memory, evidently mixes up the stories of two different expeditions. Similarly the invasions of neighboring tribes under Judas, which are represented in 1 Macc 5 1-68 as taking place in quick succession, belong, according to 2 Macc 8 30; 10 15-38; 12 2-45, to separate dates and different sets of circumstances. The statements in 2 Macc are obscure and confused, those in 1 Macc 5 clear and straightforward. Though in 2 Macc 10 37 we read of the death of Timotheus, yet in 12 2 ff he appears as a leader in other campaigns. There again the writer's memory plays him false as he recalls various accounts of the same events. It was Mattathias who gathered together the Jews and organized them for resistance against Syria, if we follow 1 Macc 2 1-70; but 2 Macc 8 1-7 ascribes this rôle to his son Judas. The purification of the temple took place 3 years subsequent to its profanation, according to 1 Macc 1 54; 4 52, but only 2 years, according to 2 Macc 10 3.

(2) The two letters sent from Palestinian to Egypt Jews (1 1-2 18) form no integral part of the original 2 Macc. They are clearly forgeries, and abound in inaccuracies and inconsistencies. The second letter, much the longer, gives an account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, which is irreconcilable with that in 9 1-28 and also with that in 1 Macc 6 1-16. Nehemiah is said in 1 18 to have rebuilt the temple and altar, a work accomplished by Zerubbabel nearly a cent. earlier (Ezr 3 3; 6 15). Nehemiah's work was to repair the gates and walls (Neh 3 1-32; 6 1; 7 1; Sir 49 13). The writer of this letter says (2 Macc 3-5) that at the time of the exile, Jeremiah concealed in a cave on Mt. Pisgah the tabernacle, the ark of the covenant and the altar of incense, a statement which no one accepts as correct or even plausible. That the author of the rest of the book is not the composer of the letters is proved by the difference of style and the contradictions in subject-matter. But that he himself prefixed them is made probable by the connecting particle in the Gr (δέ), though some (Bertholdt, Grimm, Paulus, Kusters) think rather plausibly that the letters were added by a later hand, the connection in the Gr being also introduced by him and not by the author of the rest of the book. It has been maintained that we have but one letter in 1 1-2 18, and on the other hand that there are three. But the division into two is quite natural and is almost universally accepted.

2 Macc belongs to the class of lit. called by the Germans Tendenz-Schriften, i.e. writings originating in the desire to teach some doctrine

5. Historicity or to correct some supposed error. 1 Macc gives us a history of the Maccabean wars as such, taking so little notice of the part played by God that the Divine Being is not so much as mentioned, except under the impersonal form Heaven (cf "Heaven helps those who help themselves"). Nor has 1 Macc a word to say about a life beyond the grave. In short, 1 Macc is written from the standpoint of the Sadducees, to which party the reigning dynasty (the Hasmonean) belonged. The writer of 2 Macc is evidently a Pharisee and his aim is not historical but doctrinal; i.e. the book is a historical romance with a purpose, that purpose being to make prominent the outstanding tenets of the Pharisees (see II, 6). Two extreme opinions have been defended as to the historical value of 2 Macc: (1) That 2 Macc is a strictly historical work, is more trustworthy than 1 Macc and is to be followed when the two books differ; so the bulk of Roman Catholics and also Niese and Schlatter. The supernaturalism of the book is to Romanists a recommendation. (2) That 2 Macc has virtually no historical value, since it was written for other than historical ends; so Wibrich, Kusters and Kamphausen. But the bulk of Protestant critics of recent times occupy a position midway between these two opposite opinions, viz. that 1 Macc is much more accurate than 2 Macc and is to be preferred when the 2 books of Macc differ or contradict each other; so Grimm, Reuss, Schürer, Kamphausen. On the other hand, when 2 Macc contains historical matter absent from 1 Macc it is to be accepted as correct unless opposed by intrinsic improbability or direct contrary evidence. In chs 3-5 we have details concerning the Maccabean revolt not found in 1 Macc, and in treatment of episodes or incidents with which 1 Macc deals it is often fuller and more specific, as in 10 14-23; 12 7-9 (cf 1 Macc 5 1-5; 12 17-25); 10 24-38 (cf 1 Macc 5 29-44); 12 32-45 (cf 1 Macc 5 65.68.63 f). On the other hand, the account of the celestial appearances in 3 24 ff; 11 8, etc, and the description in 6 18 ff of the martyrdom of Eleazar the scribe and of the 7 brethren and their mother, carry on their face the marks of their legendary and unhistorical character. The edifying remarks scattered throughout the book, many of them pragmatic and reminding one of the Book of Dnl, confirm the impression otherwise suggested, that the author's aim was didactic and not historical. The book as it stands is a real authority for the ideas prevalent in the writer's circle at the time of its composition.

In general it may be said that the doctrines taught in 2 Macc are those of the Pharisees of the day.

Several scholars consider 2 Macc the answer of Pharisaism to the Sadduceism of 1 Macc (see Wellhausen, Die Pharisäer und die Sadducäer; cf Geiger, Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel, 219 ff). But there is evidence enough (see II, 4) that the author of 2 Macc had not seen 1 Macc. Yet it is equally clear that 2 Macc does give prominence to the distinctive tenets of Pharisaism, and it was probably written on that account.

(1) The strictest observance of the law is enforced. The violation of the sanctity of the Sabbath countenanced under special circumstances in 1 Macc (2 39-48) is absolutely forbidden in 2 Macc (6 6.11; 8 26 f; 12 38); cf the words of the Pharisees to Petronius when the latter proposed to have a statue of the emperor Caius erected in the temple: "We will die rather than transgress the law" (Jos, Ant, XVIII, viii, 3).

(2) The Pharisaic party took but little interest in political affairs, and supported the Hasmoneans only because and in so far as they fought for the right to observe their religious rites. When, however, they compromised with Hellenism, the Pharisees turned against them and their allies the Sadducees. In this book we miss the unstinted praise accorded the Hasmonean leaders in 1 Macc, and it is silent as to the genealogy of the Hasmoneans, the death of Judas Maccabaeus and the family grave at Modin.

(3) The book reveals thus early the antagonism between the Pharisees and the priestly party, which is so evident in the Gospels. The high-priesthood had through political circumstances become the property of the Maccabees, though they were not of the Aaronic family, or even of the tribe of Levi. The priestly circle became the aristocratic, broad-church party, willing to come to terms with Gr thought and life. Hence in 2 Macc, Jason and Menelaus are fit representatives of the priesthood. In the list of martyrs (chs 6 f) no priest appears, but on the other hand, Eleazar, one of the principal scribes—scribes and Pharisees were then as in NT times virtually one party—suffered for his loyalty to the national religion, "leaving his death for an example" (6 18-31).

(4) The temple occupies a high and honorable place in 2 Macc, as in the mind of the orthodox party (see 2 19; 3 2; 5 15; 9 16; 13 23; 14 31). Great stress is laid on the importance of the feasts (6 6; 10 8, etc), of sacrifice (10 3), of circumcision

(6 10), of the laws of diet (6 18; 11 31). The author seems in particular anxious to recommend to his readers (Egyp Jews) the observance of the two new festivals instituted to commemorate the purification of the temple after its pollution by the Syrians and also the victory over Nicanor. According to this book the Hanukkah feast was established immediately after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (10 6 ff), not before this event (1 Macc 4 56), probably to give it additional importance. The book closes with the defeat and death of Nicanor and the founding of the Nicanor Day festival, without mentioning the death of Judas, as though the writer's aim was to give prominence to the two new festivals.

(5) This book shows a Jewish particularism which agrees well with Pharisaism and Scribism, but is opposed to the broader sentiments of the ruling party: Israel is God's people (1 26); His portion (14 15); He often intervenes miraculously on behalf of Israel and the religion of Israel (3 24-30; 10 29 f; 11 6-8); even the calamities of the nation are proofs of Divine love because designed for the nation's good (5 18); but the sufferings brought upon the heathen are penal and show the Divine displeasure (4 38; 5 9; 13 8; 15 32 f). The writer is deadly opposed to the introduction of Gr customs and in particular to the establishment of a gymnasium in Jerus (4 7 f; 11 24). The Book of Jub, also written by a zealous Pharisee, takes up the same hostile attitude toward foreign customs (see 3 31; 7 20, and the note by R. H. Charles [Book of Jub] on the former).

(6) This book gives prominence to the doctrine of a resurrection and of a future life about which 1 Macc, a document of the Sadducee party, is silent (cf I, 5 above; see 7 9.11.14.36; 12 43-45; 14 46 [cf IV, 4, below]). The Sadducees, to which the Hasmoneans belonged, denied a resurrection, limiting their conception of religion to the present life, in this agreeing with the teaching of the Heb Scriptures down to the time of the exile (536 BC). But the Pharisees and scribes, though professing to rest their beliefs on the "Law of Moses," departed from that law in this matter (see Warburton, The Divine Legation of Moses). The resurrection is to be a bodily one (7 11.22 f; 14 46) and to a life that is unending (7 9.36). The following related beliefs supported in this book and forming part of the creed of orthodox Pharisaism are adduced by Romanists on behalf of their own teaching: (a) the efficacy of prayers for the dead (12 44); (b) the power exercised by the intercession of saints (15 12-14); Philo (De execrat., 9) and Jos (Ant, I, xi, 3) held the same doctrine; (c) the atoning character of the martyrdom of the righteous (7 36.38; cf 4 Macc 17 22; see IV, 4, [3], below).

(7) The angelology of 2 Macc forms a prominent feature of the book (see 3 24-30; 10 29 f; 11 6-8). The Sadducees accepted the authority of the Pent, though they rejected tradition. They were therefore inconsistent in allowing no place for angelic beings in their creed, though consistent in rejecting the doctrine of a future life.

(8) The comparative silence of this book on the question of the Messianic hope is strikingly in contrast with the prominence of the subject in Ps Sol (17.23 ff, etc; see Ryle and James, Psalms of Solomon, lii ff) and other contemporary writings emanating from the Pharisees. But why should the author of 2 Macc be expected to give equal prominence to all his opinions in one tract? Some such hope as that connected with the Messiah does, however, seem to be implied in 1 27; 2 18; 7 33; 14 15.

The present writer holds that one man is responsible for 2 Macc in its present form and that the only written source was the 2 letters with which the book opens (1 1—2 18) (see II, 4, above).

7. The Author

Even if we have to assume an original in 5 books of which 2 Macc, as we have it, is but an epitome, it is not possible to distinguish between the sentiments of "Jason" and his epitomizer. The author—assuming but one—was evidently an Egypt, probably an Alexandrian Jew, who nevertheless retained his loyalty to the Jerus temple and its constitutions and desired to prevent the alienation of his fellow-countrymen in the same country from the home sanctuary and its feasts, esp. the two new feasts, Hanukkah (Dedication) and Nicanor Day. The Jews of Egypt had a temple of their own, in opposition to the teaching of the Jewish law (D and P; cf Dt 12 2-18 and Lev 17 1-9; 19 30), and it was perhaps the growing influence of this temple that prompted the author to compose this book which sets so much honor upon the Jerus temple and its observances. The character of the Gr (see II, 9, below), the ignorance of Pal and also the deep interest in Egypt which this book reveals—these and other considerations point to the conclusion that the author lived and wrote in Egypt. There is no evidence that Judas Maccabaeus (Leon Allatius), or the author of Sir (Hasse) or Philo the Jew (Honorius d'Autun) or Jos wrote the book, though it has been ascribed by different scholars to each of the persons named.

The book must have been written sufficiently long after 161 BC, the year with which the record closes, to allow mythical tales of the martyrdoms in chs 6 f and the history of the supernatural appearances in 3 24-30, etc., to arise. If we allow 30 years, or the lifetime of a generation, we come down to say 130 BC as a terminus a quo. There is probably in 15 36 a reference to the Book of Est (so Cornill, Kautzsch and Wellhausen, IJG<sup>1</sup>, 302 f) which would bring the terminus a quo down to about 100 BC. That 2 Macc was written subsequently to 1 Macc (i.e. after 80 BC) is made certain by the fact that the Jews now pay tribute to Rome (8 10.36). Since Philo, who died about 40 AD, refers to 4 8—7 42 (Quod omnis probus liber, Works, ed Mangey, II, 459), the book must have been composed before 40 AD. This is confirmed by the certainty that it was written before the destruction of Jerus and the temple (70 AD), for the city still exists and the temple services are in full operation (3 6 ff, etc.). He 11 35 f is no doubt an echo of 6 18—7 42 and shows that the unknown author of He had 2 Macc before him. The teaching of the book represents the views of the Pharisees about the middle of the last cent. BC. A date about 40 BC would agree with all the evidence.

That the original language was Gr is made exceedingly likely by the easy flow of the style and the almost entire absence of Hebraisms (yet see 8 15; 9 5; 14 24). No scholar of any standing has pleaded for a Heb original of the present book. Bertholdt, however, argued that the two letters (1 1—2 18) were composed in Heb (or Aram.). Ewald held that the 2d letter (1 11—2 18) is from the Heb, and Schlünkes that this applies to the 1st only. But the evidence given by these scholars is unconvincing, though the 1st letter is certainly more Hebraic in style than the 2d, the contrary of what Ewald said.

9. Original Language

As to the texts and versions, see I, 9, above, where the statements apply here with but slight qualifications. But the book is lacking in N as well as in A. In addition to the Old Lat text adopted for the Vulg, we have another Lat text in Cod. Ambrosianus, published in 1824 by Peyron; but this book is unrepresented in Sabatier's collection of Old Lat texts.

III. 3 Maccabees.

—The name 3 Macc, though occurring in the oldest MSS and VSS, is quite unsuitable, because the book refers to events which antedate the Maccabean age by about half a cent., and also to events in which the Maccabees took no part. But this book tells of sufferings and triumphs on the part of loyal Jews comparable to those of the Maccabean period. Perhaps the term Maccabees was generalized so as to denote all who suffered for their faith. Some hold that the book was written originally as a kind of introduction to the Books of Macc, which it precedes as Book I in Cotton's Five Books of Maccabees. But the contents of the book do not agree with this view. Perhaps the title is due to a mistake on the part of a copyist.

The book has never been reckoned as canonical by the Western church, as is shown by the fact that

1. Name

it exists in no edition of the Vulg

2. Canon-

and was not included in the Canon by the Council of Trent. It is for the latter reason absent from the Protestant VSS of the Apoc which contain but the Books of Macc (1 and 2). But 3 Macc has a place in two uncials of the LXX (A and V) and also in the ancient (Pesh) Syr VS of the Scriptures, and it is given canonical rank in the Apos Const (canon 85). The book must therefore have been held in high esteem in the early church.

3 Macc is a historical novel in which there is much more romance than history, and more silly and superficial writing than either. It professes to narrate occurrences in the history of the Jews which took place at Jerus and at Alexandria in which the Jews were persecuted but in various ways delivered.

(1) 1 1—2 24: After conquering at Raphia Antiochus III, the great king of Syria (224-187 BC), Ptolemy IV Philopator, king of Egypt (221-204 BC), resolved to visit Jerus and to enter the sanctum ("holy of holies," naos, naós) of the temple to which by the Jewish law access was allowed only to the high priest, and even to him but once a year (Day of Atonement [1 11]). The Jews, priests and people, were in a paroxysm of grief and earnestly entreated him to desist, but he persisted in his plan. They then through Simon, the high priest, 219-199 BC, prayed that God might intervene and avert this desecration. The prayer is answered, the king being paralyzed before realizing his purpose.

(2) 2 25-30: Returned to Alexandria, Ptolemy is exasperated at the failure of his long-cherished project and resolves to wreak his vengeance upon the Jews of Egypt. He issues a decree that all Jews in Alexandria who refused to bend the knee to Bacchus should be deprived of all their rights as citizens.

(3) 2 31—4 21: A goodly number of Alexandrian Jews refuse to obey the royal mandate, whereupon Ptolemy issues an edict that all the Jews of Egypt, men, women and children, shall be brought in chains to Alexandria and confined in the race-course (hippodrome), with a view to their wholesale massacre. Prior to the massacre there is to be a complete register taken of the names of the assembled Jews. Before the list is complete the writing materials give way and the huge slaughter is averted.

(4) 4 22—6 21: The king, still thirsting for the blood of this people, hits upon a different method of compassing their ruin. Five hundred elephants are intoxicated with wine and incense and let loose upon the Jews in the race-course. Here we have the principal plot of the book, and we reach the climax in the various providential expedients, childish in their character, of preventing the execution of the king's purpose. The lesson of it all seems to be that God will deliver those who put their trust in Him.

(5) 6 22—7 23: At length the king undergoes a change of heart. He releases the Jews and restores them to all their lost rights and honors. In response to their request, he gives them permission to slay their brother-Jews who, in the hour of trial, had given up their faith. They put to death 300, "esteeming this destruction of the wicked a season of joy" (7 15).

3 Maccis made up of a number of incredible tales, the details of which are absurd and contradictory. The beginning of the book has evidently been lost, as appears from the opening words, "Now when Philopator" (ὁ δὲ Φιλοπάτωρ, ho de Philopator), and also from the references to an earlier part of the narrative now lost, e.g.: 1 1 ("from those who came back"); 1 2 ("the plot afore mentioned"); 2 25 ("the aforementioned boon companions"), etc.

The book contains very little that is true history, notwithstanding what Israel Abrahams (see "Literature" to this section), depending largely

4. Historicity on Mahaffy (The Empire of the Ptolemies), says to the contrary. It is much more manifest than even in the case of 2 Macc that the writer's aim was to convey certain impressions and not to write history (see III, 5).

The improbabilities of the book are innumerable (see Bissell, The Apoc of the OT, 616 f), and it is evident that we have to do here with a combination of legends and fables worked up in feeble fashion with a view to making prominent certain ideas which the author wishes his readers to keep in mind. Yet behind the fiction of the book there are certain facts which prompted much of what the writer says.

(1) That Ptolemy IV bore the character of cruelty and capriciousness and effeminacy is borne out by Polybius (204–121 BC) in his History and by Plutarch in his Life of Cleomenes.

(2) The brief outline of the war between Ptolemy IV and Antiochus III, the latter being conquered at Raphia (chs 1 f), agrees in a general way with what has been written by Polybius, Livy and Justin.

(3) In this book, by the command of Ptolemy, 500 intoxicated elephants are let loose upon the Jews brought bound to the race-course of Alexandria. Jos (Cap, II, v) tells us that Ptolemy VII Physcon, king of Egypt, 145–117 BC, had the Jews of Alexandria, men, women and children, brought bound and naked to an inclosed space and that he had let loose on them a herd of elephants, which, however, turned instead upon his own men, killing a large number of them. The cause of the king's action was that the Jewish residents of Alexandria sided with his foes. In 3 Macc the cause of the action of Ptolemy IV was the failure of his project to enter the sanctum of the Jerus temple; this last perhaps a reflection of 2 Macc 3 9 f, where it is related that Heliodorus was hindered from entering the temple by a ghostly apparition. Now these two incidents, in both of which Jews are attacked by intoxicated elephants, must rest upon a common tradition and have probably a nucleus of fact. Perhaps, as Israel Abrahams holds, the tradition arose from the action of the elephants of Ptolemy in the Battle of Raphia. Most writers think that the reference is to something that occurred in the reign of Ptolemy VII.

(4) The shutting-up of the Jews in the race-course at Alexandria was not improbably suggested by a similar incident in which Herod the Great was the principal agent.

(5) In the opinion of Grimm (Comm., 216) we have in the two festivals (6 36; 7 19) and in the existence of the synagogue at Ptolemais an implied reference to some great deliverance vouchsafed to the Jews.

3 Macc was probably written by an Alexandrian Jew at a time when the Jews in and around Alexandria were sorely persecuted on account of their religion. The purpose of the author seems to have been to comfort those suffering for the 5. Aim and Teaching faith by giving examples showing how God stands by His people, helping in all their trials and delivering them out of the hands of their enemies. Note further the following points: (1) The book, unlike 2 Macc, is silent as to a bodily resurrection and a future life, though this may be due to pure accident. Hades (Αἰδης, Haidēs) in 4 8; 5 42; 6 31, etc., appears to stand only for death, regarded as the end of all human life. (2) Yet the belief in angelic beings is clearly implied (see 6 18 f). (3) The author has much confidence in the power of prayer (see 2 10; 2 21–24; 5 6–10.13.50 f; 6 1–15, etc.). (4) The book lays stress upon the doctrine that God is on the side of His people (4 21, etc.), and even though they transgress His commandments He will forgive and save them (2 13; 4 13, etc.).

From the character of the Gr, the interest shown in Alexandrian Judaism, and the acquaintance displayed with Egypt affairs (see I. Abrahams, op. cit., 39 f), it may be inferred with confidence that the author was a Jew residing in Alexandria.

6. Authorship and Date The superior limit (terminus a quo) for the date is some time in the last cent. BC. Since the existence of the additions to Dnl is implied (see Dnl 6 6), the inferior limit (terminus ad quem) is some time before 70 AD. If the temple had been destroyed, the continuance of the temple services could not have been implied (see 1 8 f). As the book seems written to comfort and encourage Alexandrian Jews at a time when they were persecuted, Ewald, Hausrath, Reuss and others thought it was written during the reign of the emperor Caligula (37–41 AD), when such a persecution took place. But if Ptolemy is intended to represent Caligula, it is strange, as Schürer (GJV<sup>4</sup>, III, 491) remarks, that the writer does not make Ptolemy claim Divine honors, a claim actually made by Caligula.

Though Jos (d. 95 AD) could not have known the book, since his version of the same incidents differs so much, yet it must have been written some 30 years before his death, i.e. before the destruction of Jerus and the temple in 71 AD.

That 3 Macc was composed in Gr is the opinion of all scholars and is proved by the free, idiomatic and rather bombastic character of the language in the

7. Original Language LXX.

(1) Greek.—This book occurs in the two uncials A and V (not in B or N), in most cursives and also in nearly all edd of the LXX.

(2) Syriac.—The Syr VS (Pesh) reproduced in the Paris and London Polyglot and by Lagarde, Lib. Apoc. Vet. Test. It is not a good tr.

(3) Latin.—The earliest Lat tr is that made for the Complutensian Polyglot.

8. Text and Versions (4) The earliest in Eng. is that of Walter Lynne (1650).

LITERATURE.—Besides the comms. by Grimm (the best), Bissell (Lange), Kautzsch and Emmet (Oxford Apoc.), and the arts. in HDB (Fairweather, excellent), EB (Torrey, good), GJV<sup>4</sup> (Schürer), III, 489–92; HJP, II, iii, 216–19, let the following be noted: A. Hausrath, A Hist of NT Times, 1895, II, 70 f; Wibrich, Juden u. Griechen; Abrahams, "The Third Book of the Macc." JQR, IX, 1897, 39–58; A. Büchler, Die Tobitaden u. die Oniaden, 1899, 172–212. Both Abrahams and Büchler defend the historicity of some parts of 3 Macc; Wibrich, "Der historische Kern des III. Makk." Hermes, Bd. 39, 1904, 244–58. For ET see (1) Henry Cotton, The Five Books of Macc (Cotton calls it First Book of Macc); (2) W. R. Churton, The Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures, and (3) Baxter, The Apoc, Gr and Eng.

IV. 4 Maccabees.—4 Macc is a philosophical treatise or discourse on the supremacy of pious reason (= religious principle) in the virtuous man.

1. Name The oldest title of the book, 4 Macc (Μακκαβαίων δ, Makkabaion d, [4]), occurs in the earliest extant MSS of the LXX work ended with ch 19. Ginsburg (op. cit., III, 17), Bissell (Apoc. 639) and Wellhausen (Der arab. Josippus) give useful tables showing the dependence of the various parts of 5 Macc on the sources used.

In so far as this book repeats the contents of 1 and 2 Macc and Jos, it has the historical value of the sources used. But in itself the book has no historical worth. The author calls Rom and Egypt soldiers "Macedonians," Mt. Gerizim, "Jezebel," Samaria "Sebaste," Shechem "Neapolis" or "Naploris." Herod and Pilate exchange names. Some of the mistakes may of course be traceable to the tr.

The original work was almost certainly composed in Heb, though we have no trace of a Heb text (so Ginsburg, op. cit., and Bissell). This

5. Original conclusion is supported by the numerous Hebraisms which show themselves even in a double tr. The Pent is called the "Torah," the Heb Scriptures are spoken of as "the twenty-four books," the temple is "the house of God" or "the holy house," Judaea is "the land of the holy house" and Jerus is "the city of the holy house." These and like examples make it probable that the writer was a Jew and that the language he used was Heb. Zunz (Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge, 1832, 146 ff), Graetz (Geschichte, V, 281) and Dr. S. Davidson (op. cit., 465) say the book was written in Arab. from Heb memoirs. According to Zunz (l.c.) and Graetz (l.c.) the Jewish history of Joseph ben Gorion (Josippon), the "pseudo-Josephus" (10th cent.), is but a Heb recension of 5 Macc (the Arab. 2 Macc). On the contrary, Wellhausen (op. cit.) and Schürer (GJV, I, 159 f) maintain that the shorter narrative in 5 Macc represents the extent of the original composition far more correctly than the Heb history of Josippon (which ranges from Adam to 70 AD), and than other recensions of the same history.

The book was compiled for the purpose of consoling the Jews in their sufferings and encouraging them to be steadfast in their devotion

6. Aim and Teaching was contemplated in 2, 3 and 4 Macc and in a lesser degree in 1 Macc, but the author or compiler of the present treatise wished to produce a work which would appeal in the first instance and chiefly to Heb (or Arab.?) readers. The author believes in a resurrection of the body, in a future life and a final judgment (5 13.43 f). The righteous will dwell in future glory, the wicked will be hereafter punished (5 49.50 f; 59 14).

We have no means of ascertaining who the author was, but he must have been a Jew and he lived some

7. Authorship and Date time after the destruction of the temple in 70 AD (see 9 5; 21 30; 22 9; 53 8, though Ginsburg regards these passages as late additions and fixes the date of the original work at about 6 BC, when the history ends). The author makes large use of Jos (d. 95 AD), which also favors the lower date.

The Arab. text of the book and a Lat tr by Gabriel Sionita is printed in the Paris and London Polyglots.

8. Text and Versions No other ancient text has come down to us. Cotton (op. cit. xxx) errs in saying that there is a Syr VS of the book.

LITERATURE.—The most important lit. has been mentioned in the course of the art. The Eng. and earlier Ger. edd of Schürer, GJV, do not help. The only Eng. tr is that by Cotton made directly from the Lat of Gabriel Sionita. Bissell says that a Fr. VS appears as an appendix in the Bible of de Sacy; not, however, in the Nouvelle Édition (1837) in the possession of the present writer.

LITERATURE

A country lying to the N. of Greece, afterward enlarged and formed into a Rom province; it is to the latter that the term always refers when used in the NT.

I. The Macedonian People and Land.—Ethnologists differ about the origin of the Macedonian race and the degree of its affinity to the Hellenes. But we find a well-marked tradition in ancient times that the race comprised a Hellenic element and a non-Hellenic, though Aryan, element, closely akin to the Phrygian and other Thracian stocks. The dominant race, the Macedonians in the narrower sense of the term, including the royal family, which was acknowledged to be Gr and traced its descent through the Temenids of Argos back to Heracles (Herod. v.22), settled in the fertile plains about the lower Haliae mon (Karasi or Vistriza) and Axios (Vardar), to the N. and N.W. of the Thermaic Gulf. Their capital, which was originally at Edessa or Aegae (Vodhena), was afterward transferred to Pella by Philip II. The other and older element—the Lyncestians, Orestians, Pelagonians and other tribes—were pushed back northward and westward into the highlands, where they struggled for generations to maintain their independence and weakened the Macedonian state by constant risings and by making common cause with the wild hordes of Illyrians and Thracians, with whom we find the Macedonian kings in frequent conflict. In order to maintain their position they entered into a good understanding from time to time with the states of Greece or acknowledged temporarily Pers suzerainty, and thus gradually extended the sphere of their power.

II. History of Macedonia.—Herodotus (viii.137-39) traces the royal line from Perdiccas I through Argaeus, Philip I, Aeropus, Alcetas and Amyntas I to Alexander I, who was king at the time of the Pers invasions of Greece. He and his son and grandson, Perdiccas II and Archelaus, did much to consolidate Macedonian power, but the death of Archelaus (399 BC) was followed by 40 years of disunion and weakness.

With the accession of Philip II, son of Amyntas II, in 359 BC, M. came under the rule of a man powerful alike in body and in mind, an able general and an astute diplomatist, one, moreover, who started out with a clear perception of the end at which he must aim, the creation of a great national army and a nation-state, and worked consistently and untiringly throughout his reign of 23 years to gain that object. He welded the Macedonian tribes into a single nation, won by

1. Philip and Alexander force and fraud the important positions of Amphipolis, Pydna, Potidaea, Olynthus, Abdera and Maronea, and secured a plentiful supply of gold by founding Philippi on the site of Crenides. Gradually extending his rule over barbarians and Greeks alike, he finally, after the battle of Chaeronea (338 BC), secured his recognition by the Greeks themselves as captain-general of the Hellenic states and leader of a Graeco-Macedonian crusade against Persia. On the eve of this projected eastern expedition, however, he was assassinated by order of his dishonored wife Olympias (336 BC), whose son, Alexander the Great, succeeded to the throne. After securing his hold on Thrace, Illyria and Greece, Alexander turned eastward and, in a series of brilliant campaigns, overthrew the Pers empire. The battle of the Granicus (334 BC) was followed by the submission or subjugation of most of Asia Minor. By the battle of Issus (333), in which Darius himself was defeated, Alexander's way was opened to Phoenicia and Egypt; Darius' second defeat, at Arbela (331), sealed the fate of the Pers power. Babylon, Susa, Persepolis and Ecbatana were taken in turn, and Alexander then pressed eastward through Hyrcania, Aria, Arachosia, Bactria and Sogdiana to India, which he conquered as far as the Hyphasis (Sutlej): thence he returned through Gedrosia, Carmania and Persis to Babylon, to make preparations for the conquest of Arabia. A sketch of his career is given in 1 Macc 1 1-7, where he is spoken of as "Alexander the Macedonian, the son of Philip, who came out of the land of Chittim" (ver 1): his invasion of Persia is also referred to in 1 Macc 6 2, where he is described as "the Macedonian king, who reigned first among the Greeks," i.e. the first who united in a single empire all the Gr states, except those which lay to the W. of the Adriatic. It is the conception of the Macedonian power as the deadly foe of Persia which is responsible for the description of Haman in Ad Est 16 10 as a Macedonian, "an alien in truth from the Pers blood," and for the attribution to him of a plot to transfer the Pers empire to the Macedonians (ver 14), and this same thought appears in the LXX rendering of the Heb Agagite (אֶגְאִי, 'aghaqi) in Est 9 24 as Macedonian (Makedōn).

Alexander died in June 323 BC, and his empire fell a prey to the rivalries of his chief generals (1 Macc 1 9); after a period of struggle

2. Roman Intervention and chaos, three powerful kingdoms were formed, taking their names from Macedonia, Syria and Egypt. Even in Syria, however, Macedonian influences remained strong, and we find Macedonian troops in the service of the Seleucid monarchs (2 Macc 8 20). In 215 King Philip V, son of Demetrius II and successor of Antigonus Doson (229-220 BC), formed an alliance with Hannibal, who had defeated the Rom forces at Lake Trasimene (217) and at Cannae (216), and set about trying to recover Illyria. After some years of desultory and indecisive warfare, peace was concluded in 205, Philip binding himself to abstain from attacking the Rom possessions on the E. of the Adriatic. The Second Macedonian War, caused by a combined attack of Antiochus III of Syria and Philip of Macedon on Egypt, broke out in 200 and ended 3 years later in the crushing defeat of Philip's forces by T. Quinctius Flaminius at Cynoscephalae in Thessaly (cf 1 Macc 8 5). By the treaty which followed this battle, Philip surrendered his conquests in Greece, Illyria, Thrace, Asia Minor and the Aegean, gave up his fleet, reduced his army to 5,000 men, and undertook to declare no war and conclude no alliance without Rom consent.

In 179 Philip was succeeded by his son Perseus, who at once renewed the Rom alliance, but set to work to consolidate and extend his power. In 172 3. Roman Conquest war again broke out, and after several Rom reverses the consul Lucius Aemilius Paulus decisively defeated the Macedonians at Pydna in 168 BC (cf 1 Macc 8 5, where Perseus is called "king of Chittim"). The kingdom was abolished and Perseus was banished to Italy. The Macedonians were declared free and autonomous; their land was divided into four regions, with their capitals at Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella and Pelagonia respectively, and each of them was governed by its own council; commercium and connubium were forbidden between them and the gold and silver mines were closed. A tribute was to be paid annually to the Rom treasury, amounting to half the land tax hitherto exacted by the Macedonian kings.

But this compromise between freedom and subjection could not be of long duration, and after the revolt of Andrisus, the pseudo-Philip, was quelled (148 BC), M. was constituted a Rom province and enlarged by the addition of parts of Illyria, Epirus, the Ionian islands and Thessaly. Each year a governor was dispatched from Rome with supreme military and judicial powers; the partition fell into abeyance and communication within the province was improved by the construction of the Via Egnatia from Dyrrhachium to Thessalonica, whence it was afterward continued eastward to the Nestus and the Hellespont. In 146 the Achaeans, who had declared war on Rome, were crushed by Q. Caecilius Metellus and L. Mummius. Corinth was sacked and destroyed, the Achaean league was dissolved, and Greece, under the name of Achaia, was made a province and placed under the control of the governor of M. In 27 BC, when the administration of the provinces was divided between Augustus and the Senate, M. and Achaia fell to the share of the latter (Strabo, p. 840; Dio Cassius liii.12) and were governed separately by ex-praetors sent out annually with the title of proconsul. In 15 AD, however, senatorial mismanagement had brought the provinces to the verge of ruin, and they were transferred to Tiberius (Tacitus, Annals, i.76), who united them under the government of a legatus Augusti pro praetore until, in 44 AD, Claudius restored them to the Senate (Suetonius, Claudius 25; Dio Cassius lx 24). It is owing to this close historical and geographical connection that we find M. and Achaia frequently mentioned together in the NT, M. being always placed first (Acts 19 21; Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 9 2; 1 Thess 1 7-8).

Diocletian (284-305 AD) detached from M. Thessaly and the Illyrian coast lands and formed them into two provinces, the latter under the name of Epirus Nova. Toward the end of the 4th cent. what remained of M. was broken up into two provinces, Macedonia prima and Macedonia secunda or salutaris, and when in 395 the Rom world was divided into the western and eastern empires, M. was included in the latter. During the next few years it was overrun and plundered by the Goths under Alaric, and later, in the latter half of the 6th cent., immense numbers of Slavonians settled there. In the 10th cent. a large part of it was under Bulgarian rule, and afterward colonies of various Asiatic tribes were settled there by the Byzantine emperors. In 1204 it became a Lat kingdom under Boniface, marquis of Monferrat, but 20 years later Theodore, the Gr despot of Epirus, founded a Gr empire of Thessalonica. During the 2d half of the 14th cent. the greater part of it was part of the Servian dominions, but in 1430 Thessalonica fell before the Ottoman Turks, and from that time down to the year 1913 M. has formed part of the Turkish empire. Its history thus accounts for the very mixed character of its population, which consists chiefly of Turks, Albanians, Greeks and Bulgarians, but has in it a considerable element of Jews, Gypsies, Vlachs, Servians and other races.

III. Paul and Macedonia.—In the narrative of Paul's journeys as given us in Acts 13-28 and in the Pauline Epp., M. plays a prominent part. The apostle's relations with the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea will be found discussed under those several headings; here we will merely recount in outline his visits to the province.

On his 2d missionary journey Paul came to Troas, and from there sailed with Silas, Timothy and Luke to Neapolis, the nearest Macedonian seaport, in obedience to the vision of a 1. Paul's First Visit Macedonian (whom Ramsay identifies with Luke: see s.v. "Philippi") urging him to cross to M. and preach the gospel there (Acts 16 9). From Neapolis he journeyed inland to Philippi, which is described as "a city of M., the first of the district" (ver 12). Thence Paul and his two companions (for Luke appears to have remained in Philippi for the next 5 years) traveled along the Egnatian road, passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, to Thessalonica, which, though a "free city," and therefore technically exempt from the jurisdiction of the Rom governor, was practically the provincial capital. Driven thence by the hostility of the Jews, the evangelists preached in Beroea, where Silas and Timothy remained for a short time after a renewed outbreak of Jewish animosity had forced Paul to leave M. for the neighboring province of Achaia (Acts 17 14). Although he sent a message to his companions to join him with all speed at Athens (ver 15), yet so great was his anxiety for the welfare of the newly founded Macedonian churches that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica almost immediately (1 Thess 3 1,2), and perhaps Silas to some other part of M., nor did they again join him until after he had settled for some time in Corinth (Acts 18 5; 1 Thess 3 6). The rapid extension of the Christian faith in M. at this time may be judged from the phrases used by Paul in his 1st Ep. to the Thess., the earliest of his extant letters, written during this visit to Corinth. He there speaks of the Thessalonian converts as being an example "to all that believe in M. and in Achaia" (1 7), and he commends their love "toward all the brethren that are in all M." (4 10). Still more striking are the words, "From you hath sounded forth the word of the Lord, not only in M. and Achaia, but in every place your faith to God-ward is gone forth" (1 8).

On his 3d missionary journey, the apostle paid two further visits to M. During the course of a long stay at Ephesus he laid plans for a 2d journey through M. and Achaia, and dispatched two of his helpers, Timothy and Erastus, to M. to prepare for his visit (Acts 19 21,22). Some time later, after the uproar at Ephesus raised by Demetrius and his fellow-silversmiths (vs 23-41), Paul himself set out for M. (20 1). Of this visit Luke gives us a very summary account, telling us merely that Paul, "when he had gone through those parts, and had given them much exhortation, . . . came into Greece" (ver 2); but from 2 Cor, written from M. (probably from Philippi) during the course of this visit, we learn more of the apostle's movements and feelings. While at Ephesus, Paul had changed his plans. His intention at first had been to travel across the Aegean Sea to Corinth, to pay a visit from there to M. and to return to Corinth, so as to sail direct to Syria (2 Cor 1 15, 16). But by the time at which he wrote the 1st Ep. to the Cor, probably near the end of his stay at Ephesus, he had made up his mind to go to Corinth by way of M., as we have seen that he actually did (1 Cor 16 5,6). From 2 Cor 2 13 we learn that he traveled from Ephesus to Troas, where he expected to find Titus. Titus, however, did not yet arrive, and Paul, who "had no relief for [his] spirit," left Troas and sailed to M. Even here the same restlessness pursued him: "fightings without, fears within" oppressed him, till the presence of Titus brought some relief (2 Cor 7 5,6). The apostle was also cheered by "the grace of God which had been given in the churches of M." (8 1); in the midst of severe persecution, they bore their trials with abounding joy, and their deep poverty did not prevent them begging to be allowed to raise a contribution to send to the Christians in Jerus (Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 8 2-4). Liberality was, indeed, from the very outset one of the characteristic virtues of the Macedonian churches.

The Philippians had sent money to Paul on two occasions during his first visit to Thessalonica (Phil 4 16), and again when he had left M. and was staying at Corinth (2 Cor 11 9; Phil 4 15). On the present occasion, however, the Corinthians seem to have taken the lead and to have prepared their bounty in the previous year, on account of which the apostle boasts of them to the Macedonian Christians (2 Cor 9 2). He suggests that on his approaching visit to Achaia he may be accompanied by some of these Macedonians (ver 4), but whether this was actually the case we are not told.

The 3d visit of Paul to M. took place some 3 months later and was occasioned by a plot against his life laid by the Jews of Corinth, which led him to alter his plan of sailing from Cenchreae, the eastern seaport of Corinth, to Syria (2 Cor 1 16; Acts 20 3). He returned to M. accompanied as far as Asia by 3 Macedonian Christians—Sopater, Aristarchus and Secundus—and by 4 from Asia Minor. Probably Paul took the familiar route by the Via Egnatia, and reached Philippi immediately before the days of unleavened bread; his companions preceded him to Troas (Acts 20 5), while he himself remained at Philippi until after the Passover (Thursday, April 7, 57 AD, according to Ramsay's chronology), when he sailed from Neapolis together with Luke, and joined his friends in Troas (ver 6).

Toward the close of his 1st imprisonment at Rome Paul planned a fresh visit to M. as soon as he should be released (Phil 1 26; 2 24), and even before that he intended to send Timothy to visit the Philippian church and doubtless those of Beroea and Thessalonica also. Whether Timothy actually went on this mission we cannot say; that Paul himself went back to M. once more we learn from 1 Tim 1 3, and we may infer a 5th visit from the reference to the apostle's stay at Troas, which in all probability belongs to a later occasion (2 Tim 4 13).

IV. The Macedonian Church.—Of the churches of Macedonia in general, little need be said here.

A striking fact is the prominence in them of women, which is probably due to the higher social position held by women in this province than in Asia Minor (Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 55 ff). We find only two references to women in connection with Paul's previous missionary work; the women proselytes of high social standing take a share in driving him from Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13 50), and Timothy's mother is mentioned as a Jewess who believed (16 1). But in M. all is changed. To women the gospel was first preached at Philippi (ver 13); a woman was the first convert and the hostess of the evangelists (vs 14,15); a slave girl was restored to soundness of mind by the apostle (ver 18), and long afterward Paul mentions two women as having "labored with [him] in the gospel" and as endangering the peace of the church by their rivalry (Phil 4 2,3). At Thessalonica a considerable number of women of the first rank appear among the earliest converts (Acts 17 4), while at Beroea also the church included from the outset numerous Gr women of high position (ver 12).

The bond uniting Paul and the Macedonian Christians seems to have been a peculiarly close and affectionate one. Their liberality and open-heartedness, their joyousness and patience in trial and persecution, their activity in spreading the Christian faith, their love of the brethren—these are a few of the characteristics which Paul specially commends in them (1 and 2 Thess; Phil; 2 Cor 8 1-8), while they also seem to have been much freer than the churches of Asia Minor from Judaizing tendencies and from the allurements of "philosophy and vain deceit."

We know the names of a few of the early members of the Macedonian churches—Sopater (Acts 20 4) or Sosipater (Rom 16 21: the identification is a probable, though not a certain, one) of Berea; Aristarchus (Acts 19 29; 20 4; 27 2; Col 4 10; Philem ver 24), Jason (Acts 17 5-9; Rom 16 21?) and Secundus (Acts 20 4 of Thessalonica; Clement (Phil 4 3), Epaphroditus (Phil 2 25; 4 18), Euodia (Phil 4 2; this, not Euodias [AV], is the true form), Syntyche (ib), Lydia (Acts 16 14-40; a native of Thyatira), and possibly Luke (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 201 ff) of Philippi. Gaius is also mentioned as a Macedonian in Acts 19 29, but perhaps the reading of a few MSS Μακεδόνα is to be preferred to the TR Μακεδόνas, in which case Aristarchus alone would be a Macedonian, and this Gaius would probably be identical with the Gaius of Derbe mentioned in Acts 20 4 as a companion of Paul (Ramsay, op. cit., 280). The later history of the Macedonian churches, together with lists of all their known bishops, will be found in Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, II, 1 ff; III, 1089 ff, 1045 f.

MACHAERUS, ma-kē'rus (Μαχαίρους, Ma-chairoûs): Not mentioned in Scripture, canonical or apocryphal, but its importance in Jewish history justifies its inclusion here. Pliny (NH, v.16.72) speaks of it as, after Jerus, the strongest of Jewish fortresses. It was fortified by Alexander Jannaeus (BJ, VII, vi, 2). It was taken and destroyed by Gabinus (ib, I, viii, 5; Ant, XIV, v, 4). Herod the Great restored it and, building a city here, made it one of his residences (BJ, VII, vi, 1, 2). It lay within the tetrarchy assigned to Antipas at the death of Herod. The wife of Antipas, daughter of Aretas, privately aware of his infidelity, asked to be sent hither (Ant, XVIII, v, 1). Here Jos has fallen into confusion if he meant by the phrase "a place in the borders of the dominions of Aretas and Herod" that it was still in Herod's hands, since immediately he tells us that it was "subject to her father." It was natural enough, however, that a border fortress should be held now by one and now by the other. It may have passed to Aretas by some agreement of which we have no record; and Herod, unaware that his wife knew of his guilt, would have no suspicion of her design in wishing to visit her father. If this is true, then the Baptist could not have been imprisoned and beheaded at Machaerus (ib, 2). The feast given to the lords of Galilee would most probably be held at Tiberias; and there is nothing in the Gospel story to hint that the prisoner was some days' journey distant (Mk 6 14 ff). The citadel was held by a Rom garrison until 66 AD, which then evacuated it to escape a siege (BJ, II, xviii, 6). Later by means of a stratagem it was recovered for the Romans by Bassus, c 72 AD (BJ, VII, vi, 4).

The place is identified with the modern Mkaur, a position of great strength on a prominent height between Wādy Zerka Ma'in and Wādy el-Mōjib, overlooking the Dead Sea. There are extensive ruins.

MACHBANNAI, mak'ba-nī, -ba-nā'ī (מַכְבְּנַי, makhbannay; AV Machbanai): A Gadite who attached himself to David in Ziklag (1 Ch 12 13).

MACHBENA, mak-bē'na (מַכְבְּנָה, makhbēnāh; B, Μαχαβηνά, Machabēnā, A, Μαχαμηνά, Machamēnā; AV Machbenah): A name which occurs in the genealogical list of Judah (1 Ch 2 49), apparently the name of a place, which may be the same as "Cabbon" (Josh 15 40), probably to be identified with el-Kubeibeh, about 3 miles S. of Beit Jibrin.

MACHI, mā'kī (מָכִי, mākhī; Pesh and some MSS of LXX read "Machir"): A Gadite, father of Geuel, one of the 12 spies (Nu 13 15).

MACHIR, mā'kir (מָכִיר, mākhīr; Μαχείρ, Machetir), MACHIRITE, mā'kir-it:

(1) The eldest son of Manasseh (Gen 50 23). In Nu 26 29 it is recorded that Machir begat Gilead, but another narrative informs us that the children of Machir "went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorites that were therein. And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein" (Nu 32 39.40; Josh 17 1.3; cf also 1 Ch 2 21.25; 7 14-17; Dt 3 15; Josh 13 31). In the song of Deborah, Machir is used as equivalent to Manasseh (Jgs 5 14).

(2) Son of Ammiel, dwelling in Lo-debar (2 S 9 4.5), a wealthy landowner who protected Mephibosheth (Meribbaal), son of Jonathan, until assured of the friendly intentions of David (cf Ant, VII, ix, 8). Afterward, during the rebellion of Absalom, Machir with others came to David's assistance at Mahanaim, bringing supplies for the king and his men (2 S 17 27 ff). JOHN A. LEES

MACHMAS, mak'mas. See MICHMASH.

MACHNADEBAI, mak-nad'ē-bī, mak-na-dē'bī (מַכְנַדְבַּי, makhnadd'bhay): Son of Bani, one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40).

MACHPELAH, mak-pē'la (מַכְפֶּלֶה, ha-makh-pēlāh, "the Machpelah"; τὸ διπλοῦν, tō diploûn, "the double"): The name of a piece of ground and of a cave purchased by Abraham as a place of sepulcher. The word is supposed to mean "double" and refers to the condition of the cave. It is tr<sup>d</sup> "double cave" (τὸ διπλοῦν σπήλαιον, tō diploûn spēlāion) in the LXX in Gen 23 17. The name is applied to the ground in Gen 23 19; 49 30; 50 13, and to the cave in Gen 23 9; 25 9. In Gen 23 17 we have the phrase "the field of Ephron, which was in [the] Machpelah."

The cave belonged to Ephron the Hittite, the son of Zohar, from whom Abraham purchased it for 400 shekels of silver (Gen 23 8-16).

1. Scriptural Data It is described as "before," i.e. "to the E. of" Mamre (ver 17) which (ver 19) is described as the same as Hebron (see, too, 25 9; 49 30; 50 13). Here were buried Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah. (Cf however the curious variant tradition in Acts 7 16, "Shechem" instead of "Hebron.")

Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 7) speaks of the monuments (mnēmēta) of Abraham and his posterity which "are shown to this very time in that small city [i.e. in Hebron]; the fabric of which monuments are of the most excellent marble and wrought after the most excellent manner"; and in another

2. Tradition place he writes of Isaac being buried by his sons with his wife in Hebron

Regarding the Site where they had a monument belonging to them from their forefathers (Ant. I, xxii, 1). The references of early Christian writers to the site of the tombs of the patriarchs only very doubtfully apply to the present buildings and may possibly refer to Rāmet el-Khalīl (see MAMRE). Thus the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 AD) mentions a square enclosure built of stones of great beauty in which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were buried with their wives. Antonius Martyr (c 600) and Arculf (698) also mention this monument. Mukaddasi speaks (c 985) of the strong fortress around the tombs of the patriarchs built of great squared stones, the work of Jinns, i.e. of supernatural beings. From this onward the references are surely to the present site, and it is difficult to believe, if, as good authorities maintain, the great buttressed square wall enclosing the site is work at least as early as Herod, that the earlier references can be to any other site. It is certain that the existing buildings are very largely those which the Crusaders occupied; there are many full references to this place in mediaeval Moslem writers.

The Haram at Hebron, which present-day tradition, Christian, Jewish and Moslem, recognizes as built over the cave of Machpelah, is one of the most jealously guarded sanctuaries in the world. Only on rare occasions and through the exercise of much political pressure have a few honored Christians been allowed to visit the spot. The late King Edward VII in 1862 and the present King George V, in 1882, with certain distinguished scholars in their parties, made visits which have been chiefly important through the writings of their companions—Stanley in 1862 and Wilson and Conder in 1882. One of the latest to be accorded the privilege was C. W. Fairbanks, late vice-president of the United States of America. What such visitors have been permitted to see has not been of any great antiquity nor has it thrown any certain light on the question of the genuineness of the site.

The space containing the traditional tombs is a great quadrangle 197 ft. in length (N.W. to S.E.) and 111 ft. in breadth (N.E. to S.W.). It is enclosed by a massive wall of great blocks of limestone, very hard and akin to marble. The walls which are between 8 and 9 ft thick are of solid masonry throughout. At the height of 15 ft. from the ground, at indeed the level of the floor within, the wall is set back about 10 in. at intervals, so as to leave pilasters 3 ft. 9 in. wide, with space between each of 7 ft. all round. On the longer sides there are 16 and on the shorter sides 8 such pilasters, and there are also buttresses 9 ft. wide on each face at each angle. This pilastered wall runs up for 25 ft., giving the total average height from the ground of 40 ft. The whole character of the masonry is so similar to the wall of the Jerus Haram near the "wailing place" that Conder and Warren considered that it must belong to that period and be Herodian work.

The southern end of the great enclosure is occupied by a church—probably a building entirely of the crusading period—with a nave and two aisles. The rest is a courtyard open to the air. The cenotaphs of Isaac and Rebecca are within the church; those of Abraham and Sarah occupy octagonal chapels in the double porch before the church doors; those of Jacob and Leah are placed in chambers near the north end of the Haram. The six monuments are placed at equal distances along the length of the enclosure, and it is probable that their positions there have no relation to the sarcophagi which are described as existing in the cave itself.

It is over this cave that the chief mystery hangs. It is not known whether it has been entered by any man at present alive, Moslem or 4. The Cave otherwise. While the cave was in the hands of the Crusaders, pilgrims and others were allowed to visit this spot. Thus Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, writing in 1163 AD, says that "if a Jew comes, who gives an additional fee to the keeper of the cave, an iron door is opened, which dates from the times of our forefathers who rest in peace, and with a burning candle in his hand the visitor descends into a first cave which is empty, traverses a second in the same state and at last reaches a third which contains six sepulchres—those of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebecca and Leah, one opposite the other. . . . A lamp burns in the cave and upon the sepulchre continually, both night and day." The account reminds us of the condition of many Christian tombshrines in Pal today.

It would appear from the description of modern observers that all entrance to the cave is now closed; the only known approaches are never now opened and can only be reached by breaking up the flags of the flooring. Through one of the openings—which had a stone over it pierced by a circular hole 1 ft. in diameter—near the northern wall of the old church, Conder was able by lowering a lantern to see into a chamber some 15 ft. under the church. He estimated it to be some 12 ft. square; it had plastered walls, and in the wall toward the S.E. there was a door which appeared like the entrance to a rock-cut tomb. On the outside of the Haram wall, close to the steps of the southern entrance gateway is a hole in the lowest course of masonry, which may possibly communicate with the western cave. Into this the Jews of Hebron are accustomed to thrust many written prayers and vows to the patriarchs.

The evidence, historical and archaeological seems to show that the cave occupies only the south end of the great quadrilateral enclosure under part only of the area covered by the church. See HEBRON.

MACONAH, mā-kō'na: AV Mekonah (q.v.).

MACRON, mā'kron (Μάκρων, Mákrōn): Ptolemy Macron who had been appointed by Ptolemy Philometor VI governor of Cyprus and deserted to Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria (2 Macc 10 12 ff). Under Antiochus he was governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia (8 8). In 1 Macc 3 38 and 2 Macc 4 45 he is called "Ptolemy the son of Dorymenes." At first he was a fierce and cruel enemy of the Jews and was one of those chosen by Lysias to destroy Israel and reduce Judas Maccabee (ib). Later he apparently relented toward the Jews (2 Macc 10 12), fell into disfavor with Antiochus Eupator, before whom he was accused by the king's friends, and was so galled by being constantly called traitor that he ended his life with poison (2 Macc 10 13). S. ANGUS

MAD, MADNESS (מָדָה, hālāl, מַדְּוֹנָה, shāghā'; mania, mania): These words, and derivatives from the same roots are used to express various conditions of mental derangement. Though usually tr<sup>d</sup> "mad," or "madness," they are often used for temporary conditions to which one would scarcely apply them today except as common colloquial inaccuracies. The madness coupled with folly in

1. In the Eccl is rather the excessive frivolity and dissipation on the part of the idle OT rich (so in 1 17; 2 2-12; 7 25; 9 3; 10 13). The insensate fury of the wicked against the good is called by this name in Ps 102 8. In Dt 28 28-34 it is used to characterize the state of panic produced by the oppression of tyrannical conquerors, or (as in Zec 12 4) by the judgment of God on sinners. This condition of mind is metaphorically called a drunkenness with the wine of God's wrath (Jer 25 16; 51 7). The same mental condition due to terror-striking idols is called "madness" in Jer 50 38. The madman of Prov 26 18 is a malicious person who carries his frivolous jest to an unreasonable length, for he is responsible for the mischief he causes. The ecstatic condition of one under the inspiration of the Divine or of evil spirits, such as that described by Balaam (Nu 24 3 f), or that which Saul experienced (1 S 10 10), is compared to madness; and conversely in the Near East at the present day the insane are supposed to be Divinely inspired and to be peculiarly under the Divine protection. This was the motive which led David, when at the court of Achish, to feign madness (1 S 21 13-15). It is only within the last few years that any provision has been made in Pal for the restraint even of dangerous lunatics, and there are many insane persons wandering at large there.

This association of madness with inspiration is expressed in the name "this mad fellow" given to the prophet who came to anoint Jehu, which did not necessarily convey a disrespectful meaning (2 K 9 11). The true prophetic spirit was, however, differentiated from the ravings of the false prophets by Isaiah (44 25), these latter being called mad by Jeremiah (29 26) and Hosea (9 7).

The most interesting case of real insanity recorded in the OT is that of Saul, who, from being a shy, self-conscious young man, became, on his exaltation to the kingship, puffed up with a megalomania, alternating with fits of black depression with homicidal impulses, finally dying by suicide. The cause of his madness is said to have been an evil spirit from God (1 S 18 10), and when, under the influence of the ecstatic mood which alternated with his depression, he conducted himself like a lunatic (19 23 f), his mutterings are called "prophesyings." The use of music in his case as a remedy (1 S 16 16) may be compared with Elisha's use of the same means to produce the prophetic ecstasy (2 K 3 15).

The story of Nebuchadnezzar is another history of a sudden accession of insanity in one puffed up by self-conceit and excessive prosperity. His delusion that he had become as an ox is of the same nature as that of the daughters of Procyus recorded in the Song of Silenus by Virgil (Ecl. vi.48).

In the NT the word "lunatic" (selēniázomenoi) (AV Mt 4 24; 17 15) is correctly rendered in RV "epileptic." Undoubtedly many

2. In the of the demoniacs were persons suffering from insanity. The words "mad" NT or "madness" occur 8 t, but usually in the sense of paroxysms of passion, excitement and foolishness. Thus in Acts 26 11 Paul says that before his conversion he was "exceedingly mad" (emmainómēnos) against the Christians. In 1 Cor 14 23, those who "speak with tongues" in Christian assemblies are said to appear mad to the outsider. Rhoda was called "mad" when she announced that Peter was at the door (Acts 12 15). The madness with which the Jews were filled when Our Lord healed the man with the withered hand is called anoia, which is literally senselessness (Lk 6 11), and the madness of Balaam is called para- phronia, "being beside himself" (2 Pet 2 16). Paul is accused by Festus of having become deranged by overstudy (Acts 26 24). It is still the belief among the fellahin that lunatics are people inspired by spirits, good or evil, and it is probable that all persons showing mental derangement would naturally be described as "possessed," so that, without entering into the vexed question of demoniacal possession, any cases of insanity cured by Our Lord or the apostles would naturally be classed in the same category. See also LUNATIC.

MADMANNAH, mad-man'a (מַדְמָנָה, madh-mannāh; B, Μαχαρμ, Machartim, A, Βεδεβηνά, Bedebeñá [Josh 15 31]; B, Μαρμηνά, Marmēñá, A, Μαδμηνά, Madmēñá [1 Ch 2 49]): This town lay in the Negeb of Judah and is mentioned with Hormah and Ziklag. It is represented in Josh 19 5, etc., by Beth-marcaboth. Umm Deimneh, 12 miles N. of Beersheba, has been proposed on etymological grounds (PEF, III, 392, 399, Sh XXIV).

MADMEN, mad'men (מַדְמֵנִים, madhmēn; καὶ παύσιν παύσεται, kaí paúsín paúsetai): An unidentified town in Moab against which Jer prophesied (48 2). The play upon the words here suggests a possible error in transcription: gam madhmēn tiddōmī, "Also, Madmen, thou shalt be silenced." The initial M of "Madmen" may have arisen by dittography from the last letter of gam. We should then point Dimon, which of course is Dibon.

MADMENAH, mad-mē'na (מַדְמֵנָה, madhmēñāh; Μαδεβηνά, Madebeñá): A place mentioned only in Isaiah's description of the Assyrian advance upon Jerus (10 31). It is not identified.

MADNESS, mad'nes. See MAD, MADNESS.

MADON, mā'don (מַדּוֹן, mādhōn; B, Μαρρόν, Marrhōn, A, Μαδών, Madōn [Josh 11 1], B, Μαρμώθ, Marmōth, A, Μαρών, Marōn [Josh 12 19]): A royal city of the Canaanites named along with Hazor of Galilee. El-Medineh, "the city," on the heights W. of the Sea of Galilee, with which it might possibly be identified, probably dates only from Moslem times. It seems likely that the common confusion of the Heb מ for נ has occurred, and that we should read "Maron." The place may be then identified with Meirōn, a village with ancient ruins and rock tombs at the foot of Jebel Jermuk, a little to the N.W. of Şafed. W. EWING

MAELUS, mā-ē'lus (A, Μάηλος, Máēlos, B, Μάηλος, Mūēlos): One of those who at Esdras' request put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 26 = "Mijamin" in the || Ezr 10 25).

MAGADAN, mag'a-dan, ma-gā'dan (Μαγαδάν, Magadán; the reading of TR, Μαγδαλά [AV], Magdalá, is unsupported): This name appears only in Mt 15 39. In the || passage, Mk 8 10, its place is taken by Dalmanutha. From these two passages it is reasonable to infer that "the borders of Magadan" and "the parts of Dalmanutha" were contiguous. We may perhaps gather from the narrative that they lay on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. After the feeding of the 4,000, Jesus and His disciples came to these parts. Thence they departed to "the other side" (Mk 8 13), arriving at Bethsaida. This is generally believed to have been Bethsaida Julias, N.E. of the sea, whence He set out on His visit to Caesarea Philippi. In this case we might look for Dalmanutha and Magadan somewhere S. of the Plain of Gennesaret, at the foot of the western hills. Stanley (SP, 383) quotes Schwarz to the effect that a cave in the face of these precipitous slopes bears the name of Teliman or Talmanutha. If this is true, it points to a site for Dalmanutha near Ain el-Fulīyeh. Magadan might then be represented by el-Mejdel, a village at the S.W. corner of the Plain of Gennesaret. It is commonly identified with Magdala, the home of Mary Magdalene, but without any evidence. The name suggests that this was the site of an old Heb mighdāl, "tower" or "fortress." The village with its ruins is now the ber of that tribe. It was one of them, Bardiya, who pretended to be Smerdis and raised the rebellion against Cambyses. Rabīh Magh in Jer 39 3 does not mean "Chief Magus,"

1. Origin-ally a Median Tribe but is in Assyrian Rab mugi (apparently "commander"; cf rab mugi ša narkabti, "commander of chariots"), having no connection with "Magus" (unless perhaps Magians were employed as charioteers, Media being famous for its Nisaeen steeds). The investment of the Magi with priestly functions, possibly under Cyrus (Xen. Cyrop. viii), but probably much later, was perhaps due to the fact that Zoroaster (Zarathuštra) belonged, it is said, to that tribe. They guarded the sacred fire, recited hymns at dawn and offered sacrifices of haoma-juice, etc. Herodotus (i.132) says they also buried the dead (perhaps temporary burial is meant as in Vendidad, Farg. viii). They were granted extensive estates in Media for their maintenance, and the āthrauans and other property of the German Roman Catholics. The land in the plain has been purchased by a colony of Jews, and is once more being brought under cultivation.

The identification with Magdala is made more probable by the frequent interchange of l for n, e.g. Nathan (Heb), Nethel (Aram.). W. EWING

MAGBISH, mag'bīsh (מַגְבִּישׁ, maghbīsh; B, Μαγεβός, Magebōs, A, Μααβείς, Maabeis): An unidentified town in Benjamin, 156 of the inhabitants of which are said to have returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 30). It does not appear in Nehemiah's list (7 33). LXX (B), however, has Magebōs. The name is probably identical with Magpiash, "one who sealed the covenant" (Neh 10 20).

MAGDALA, mag'da-la. See MAGADAN.

MAGDALENE, mag'da-lēn, mag-da-lē'nē. See MARY, III.

MAGDIEL, mag'di-el (מַגְדִּיֵּל, maghdī'ēl; Gen 36 43, A, Μεροδουλ, Metoduēl; 1 Ch 1 54, A, Μαγεδουλ, Mageduēl, B, Μεδουλ, Meduēl): One of the "dukes" of Edom.

MAGI, mā'jī, THE (Μάγοι, Māgoi [Mt 2 1.7.16, "Wise-men," RV and AV, "Magi" RVM]): Were originally a Median tribe (Herod. i.101); and in Darius' Inscriptions Magush means only a mem-priests mentioned in the Avesta may have been of their number, though only once does the word "Magus" occur in the book (in the compound Mōghu-thbīsh, "Magus-hater," Yasna, lxv.7, Geldner's ed). The Magi even in Herodotus' time had gained a reputation for "magic" arts (cf Acts 13 6.8). They also studied astrology and astronomy (rationes mundi motus et siderum [Amm. Marc., xxiii.6, 32]), partly learned from Babylon.

These latter studies explain why a star was used to lead them to Christ at Bethlehem, when Our Lord was less than two years old (Mt 2 16).

2. The Magi No reliable tradition deals with the country whence these particular magi came. Justin Martyr, Tertullian and Epiphanius fancied that they came from Arabia, founding their opinion on the fact that "gold, frankincense and myrrh" abounded in Yemen. But the text says they came not from the S. but from the E. Origen held that they came from Chaldaea, which is possible. But Clement of Alexandria, Diodorus of Tarsus, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Juvenius, Prudentius and others are probably right in bringing them from Persia. Sargon's settlement of Israelites in Media (c 730-728 BC [2 K 17 6]) accounts for the large Heb element of thought which Darmesteter recognizes in the Avesta (SBE, IV, Intro, ch vi). Median astronomers would thus know Balaam's prophecy of the star out of Jacob (Nu 24 17). That the Jews expected a star as a sign of the birth of the Messiah is clear from the tractate Zohar of the G'mārā and also from the title "Son of the Star" (Bar Kōkhbā) given to a pseudo-Messiah (130–35 AD). Tacitus (Hist. v.13) and Suetonius (Vesp. iv) tell us how widespread in the East at the time of Christ's coming was the expectation that "at that time men starting from Judaea would make themselves masters of things" (cf Virgil, Ecl. iv). All this would naturally prepare the Magi to follow the star when it appeared. See also ASTROLOGY; ASTRONOMY; DIVINATION; MAGIC; WISE MEN; ZOROASTRIANISM.

LITERATURE

The word comes from a Gr adj. (μαγική, magikē) with which the noun τέχνη, téchne, "art," is understood. The full phrase is "magical art" (Wisd 17 10). But the Gr word is derived from the magi or Zoroastrian (Zoroastrian) priests. Magic is therefore historically the art practised in Persia by the recognized priests of the country. It is impossible in the present article, owing to exigencies of space, to give a full account of this important subject and of the leading views of it which have been put forth. The main purpose of the following treatment will be to consider the subject from the Bib. standpoint.

I. Definition.—In its modern accepted sense magic may be described as the art of bringing about results beyond man's own power by superhuman agencies. In the wide sense of this definition divination is but a species of magic, i.e. magic used as a means of securing secret knowledge, esp. a knowledge of the future. Divination and magic bear a similar relation to prophecy and miracle respectively, the first and third implying special knowledge, the second and fourth special power. But divination has to do generally with omens, and it is better for this and other reasons to notice the two subjects—magic and divination—apart, as is done in the present work.

II. Division of the Subject.—There are two kinds of magic: (1) impersonal; (2) personal. In the first, magic is a species of crude science, 1. Magic as for the underlying hypothesis is that Impersonal there are forces in the world which can be utilized on certain conditions, incantations, magical acts, drugs, etc. The magician in this case connects what on a very slender induction he considers to be causes and effects, mainly on the principle of post hoc ergo propter hoc. He may not know much of the causal agency; it is enough for him to know that by performing some act or reciting some formula (see CHARM) or carrying some object (see AMULET) he can secure some desired end. Frazer (Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, I, 61) says: "Magic is a kind of savage logic, an elementary species of reasoning based on similarity, contiguity and contrast." But why does the savage draw conclusions from association of ideas? There must be an implied belief in the uniformity of Nature or in the controlling power of intelligent beings.

In personal magic, living, intelligent, spiritual beings are made the real agents which men by incantations, etc., influence and even control. The magical acts may in an as Personal advanced stage include sacrifice, the incantations become prayer.

Impersonal magic is regarded by most anthropologists, including E. B. Tylor and J. Frazer, as more primitive than the second and as a lower form of it. This conclusion rests on an assumption that human culture is always progressive, that the movement is uniformly onward and upward. But this law does not always hold. The religion of Israel as taught in the 8th cent. BC stands on a higher level ethically and intellectually than that taught in the writings of Haggai, Zechariah and Ecclesiastes centuries later. Among the ancient Indians, the Rig Veda occupies much loftier ground than the much later Atharva Veda.

III. Magic and Religion.—Personal magic in its higher forms shades off into religion, and very commonly the two exist together. It is the practice to speak of sacrifice and prayer as constituting elements of the ancient and modern religions of India. But it is doubtful whether either of these has the same connotation that it bears in the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. J. Frazer (Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, I, 67 ff) says that where the operation of spirits is assumed (and "these cases are exceptional"), magic is "tinged and alloyed with religion." Such an assumption is, he admits, often made and the present writer thinks it is generally made, for even the operation of the laws of association implies it. But Frazer concludes from various considerations that "though magic is . . . found to fuse and amalgamate with religion in many ages and in many lands, there are some grounds for thinking that this fusion is not primitive." It is of course personal magic to which religion stands in closest relations. As soon as man comes to see in the beings by whose power marvels are wrought, personalities capable of emotions like himself and susceptible to persuasion, his magical art becomes an intelligent effort to propitiate these superior beings and his incantations become hymns and prayers. In all religions, Jewish, Moslem, Christian or pagan, when the act or prayer as such is held to produce certain results or to secure certain desired boons, we have to do with a species of magic. The word "religion" is inapplicable, unless it includes the idea of personal faith in a God or gods whose favor depends on moral acts and on ritual acts only in so far as they have a voluntary and ethical character. If it be granted that magic, the lower, precedes religion, the higher, this does not necessarily negative the validity of the religious concept. Mature knowledge is preceded by elementary impressions and beliefs which are subjective without objective correspondences. But this higher knowledge is none the less valid for its antecedents. If it can be proved that the Christian or any other religion has become what it is by gradual ascent from animism, magic, etc., its validity is not by this destroyed or even impaired. Religion must be judged according to its own proper evidence. But see II, end.

IV. Magic in the Bible.—The general remarks made on the Bible and divination in DIVINATION,

V, have an equal application to the 1. Hostility attitude of the Bible toward magic. to Magic This attitude is distinctly hostile, as it could not but be in documents professing to inculcate the teaching of the ethical and spiritual religion of Israel (see Dt 18 10 f; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6, etc.). Yet it is equally clear that the actual power of magic is acknowledged as clearly as its illegitimacy is pointed out. In P's account of the plagues (Ex 7-11) it is assumed that the magicians of Egypt had real power to perform superhuman feats. They throw their rods and they become serpents; they turn the waters of the Nile into blood. It is only when they try to produce gnats that they fail, though Aaron had succeeded by Yahweh's power in doing this and thus showed that Yahweh's power was greatest. But that the magicians had power that was real and great is not so much as called in question.

Among the ancient Semites (Arabs, Assyrians, Hebrews, etc) there was a strong belief in the potency of the magical words of blessing and of curse. The mere utterance of such words was regarded as enough to secure their realization. That the narrator of Nu 22-24 (J) ascribed to Balaam magical power is clear from the narrative, else why should Yahweh be represented as transferring Balaam's service to the cause of Israel? We have other Bib. references to the power of the spoken word of blessing in Gen 12 3; Ex 12 32; Jgs 17 2; 2 S 21 3, and of curse in Gen 27 29; Jgs 5 23; Job 3 8 (cf the so-called Imprecatory Psalms, and see Century Bible, "Ps," vol II, 216). On the prevalence of the belief among the Arabs, see the important work of Goldziher, Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, Theil I, 23 ff.

In Gen 30 14 (J) we have an example of the belief in the power of plants (here mandrakes) to stir up and strengthen sexual love, and

3. Influence of Charms we read in Arab. lit. of the very same superstition in connection with what is called Yabruh, almost certainly the same plant. Indeed one of the commonest forms in which magic appears is as a love-charm, and as this kind of magic was often exercised by women, magic and adultery are frequently named together in the OT (see 2 K 9 22; Nah 3 4; Mal 3 5; and cf Ex 22 18 [17], where the sorceress [AV "witch"] is to be condemned to death). We have an instance of what is called sympathetic magic (for a description of which see Jevons, Intro to Hist of Religion, 28 ff, and Frazer, Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, I, 49 ff) in Gen 30 37 ff. Jacob placed before the sheep and goats that came to drink water peeled rods, so that the pregnant ones might bring forth young that were spotted and striped. The teraphim mentioned in Gen 31 19 ff and put away with wizards during the drastic reforms of Josiah (2 K 23 24; cf Zec 10 2) were household objects supposed capable of warding off evil of every kind. The Babylonians and Assyrians had a similar custom. We read of an Assyr magician that he had statues of the gods Lugalgira and Alamu put on each side of the main entrance to his house, and in consequence he felt perfectly impregnable against evil spirits (see Tallquist, Assyr. Besch., 22).

In Isa 3 2 the kōšēm ("magician" or "diviner") is named along with the knight warrior, the judge, prophet and elder, among the stays and supports of the nation; no disapproval is expressed or implied with regard to any of them. Yet it is not to be denied that in its essential features pure Yahwism, which enforced personal faith in a pure spiritual being, was radically opposed to all magical beliefs and practices. The fact that the Hebrews stood apart as believers in an ethical and spiritual religion from the Sem and other peoples by which they were surrounded suggests that they were Divinely guided, for in other respects—art, philosophy, etc—this same Heb nation held a lower place than many contemporary nations.

V. Magical Terms Used in the Bible.—Many terms employed in the OT in reference to divination have also a magical import. See DIVINATION, VII. For a fuller discussion of Bib. terms connected with both subjects, reference may be made to T. Witton Davies, Magic, Divination and Demonology among the Hebrews and Their Neighbours, 44 ff, 78 ff; see also arts. "Divination" and "Magic" in EB, by the present writer.

Here a few brief statements are all that can be attempted. Kešem (כֶּשֶׁם), usually rendered "divination" (see Nu 23 23), has primarily a magical reference (Fleischer), though both Wellhausen (Reste des arabischen Heidenthums<sup>2</sup>, 133, n.5) and W. Robertson Smith (Jour. Phil., XIII, 278) hold that its first use was in connection with divination. The Arab. vb. ("to exorcise") and noun ("an oath") have magical meanings. But it must be admitted that the secondary meaning ("divination") has almost driven out the other. See under I, where it is held that at bottom magic and divination are one.

The vb. kāshaph (כָּשַׁף), RV "to practise sorcery," comes, as Fleischer held, from a root denoting "to have a dark appearance," to look

2. Sorcery gloomy, to be distressed, then as a suppliant to seek relief by magical means. The corresponding nouns kashshāph and m'kashshēph are rendered "sorcerer" in EV.

Lāhash (לָהַשׁ), EV "enchantment," etc (see Isa 3 3, n'bhōn lāhash, RV "the skilful enchanter"), is connected etymologically with nāhāsh, "a serpent," the n and l often interchanging in Sem. Lāhash is, therefore, as might have been expected from this etymology, used specifically of serpent charming (see Jer 8 17; Eccl 10 11; cf m'lahēsh [מְלַהֵשׁ] in Ps 58 5 [6], EV "charmer").

Hebher (הִבְהֵר) occurs in the plural only (Isa 47 9, 12, EV "enchantments"). It comes from a root meaning "to bind," and it denotes

4. Amulets probably amulets of some kind carried on the person to ward off evil. It seems therefore to be the Bib. equivalent of the Talmudic kēmīa' (קִמְיָא), lit. "something bound," from kāma' (כָּמַא), "to bind."

Shiḥar (שִׁיחַר) (Isa 47 11) seems to have an etymological connection with the principal Arab. word for "magic" (shḥrun), and is explained by the great majority of recent commentators following J. H. Michaelis (Hitzig, Ewald, Dillmann, Whitehouse in Century Bible, etc) as meaning "to charm away" (by incantations). So also Tg, Rashi, JH and JD, Michaelis, Eichhorn, etc.

The vb. battologēō (βαττολογέω) in Mt 6 7 (= "say not the same thing over and over again") refers to the superstition that the repeated utterance of a word will secure one's wish. In India today it is thought that if an ascetic says in one month the name of Radha, Krishna or Rom 100,000 times, he cannot fail to obtain what he wants (see 1 K 18 26). See REPETITION.

The term gōlēs (γόλῆς), RV "impostors," AV "seducers," is used of a class of magicians who uttered certain magical formulae in 7. Impos-tors a deep, low voice (cf the vb. gōdō [γῶδω], which = "to sigh," "to utter low moaning tones"). Herodotus (ii.33) says that there were persons of the kind in Egypt, and they are mentioned also by Euripides and Plato.

Paul in Gal 5 20 classes with uncleanness, idolatry, etc, what he calls pharmakela (φάρμακela), AV "witchcraft," RV "sorcery." The word has reference first of all to drugs used in exercising the magical art. Note the name Simon Magus, which = Simon the magician (Acts 8 9 f), and Bar-Jesus, whom Luke calls a magician (μάγος, mágos, EV "sorcerer") and to whom he gives also the proper name Elymas, which is really the Arab. ʿālim = "learned," and so one skilful in the magical art. See also under AMULET; CHARM; DEMON-OLGY; WITCHCRAFT.

LITERATURE.—A very full bibliography of the subject will be found in T. Witton Davies, Magic, Divination and Demonology among the Hebrews and Their Neighbours, xi-xvi. MAGISTRATE, maj'is-trāt (שֹׁפֵט, shēphat, corresponding to שָׁפַט, shāphat, "to judge," "to pronounce sentence" [Jgs 18 7]): Among the ancients, the terms corresponding to our "magistrate" had a much wider signification. "Magistrates and judges" (שֹׁפְטֵי הַדָּרֹשׁ, shōphē'im v-dharyyānīm) should be tr'd "judges and rulers" (Ezr 7 25). שֹׁפְטֵי, shōphē'im, "rulers" or "nobles" were Bab magistrates or prefects of provinces (Jer 51 23.28.57; Ezk 23 6). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Jewish magistrates bore the same title (Ezr 9 2; Neh 2 16; 4 14; 13 11). The Gr ἀρχων, archōn, "magistrate" (Lk 12 58; Tit 3 1 AV), signifies the chief in power (1 Cor 2 6.8) and "ruler" (Acts 4 26; Rom 13 3).

The Messiah is designated as the "prince [archōn] of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1 5 AV), and by the same term Moses is designated the judge and leader of the Hebrews (Acts 7 27.35). The wide application of this term is manifest from the fact that it is used of magistrates of any kind, e.g. the high priest (Acts 23 5); civil judges (Lk 12 58; Acts 16 19); ruler of the synagogue (Lk 8 41; Mt 9 18.23; Mk 5 22); persons of standing and authority among the Pharisees and other sects that appear in the Sanhedrin (Lk 14 1; Jn 3 1; Acts 3 17). The term also designates Satan, the prince or chief of the fallen angels (Mt 9 34; Eph 2 2).

In the NT we also find στρατηγός, stratēgós, employed to designate the Rom praetors or magistrates of Philippi, a Rom colony (Acts 16 20.22.35.36.38). A collective term for those clothed with power (Eng. "the powers"), ἐξουσίαι, exousiai, is found in Lk 12 11 AV; Rom 13 2.3; Tit 3 1. The "higher powers" (Rom 13 1) are all those who are placed in positions of civil authority from the emperor down.

In early Heb history, the magisterial office was limited to the hereditary chiefs, but Moses made the judicial office elective. In his time the "heads of families" were 59 in number, and these, together with the 12 princes of the tribes, composed the Sanhedrin or Council of 71. Some of the scribes were intrusted with the business of keeping the genealogies and in this capacity were also regarded as magistrates.

MAGNIFICAL, mag-nif'i-kal (גָּדַל, gādhal, in Hiph. "to make great"): Old form retained from Genevan VS in 1 Ch 22 5; in ARV "magnificent."

MAGNIFICAT, mag-nif'i-kat: The name given to the hymn of Mary in Lk 1 46-55, commencing "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Three old Lat MSS substitute the name "Elisabeth" for "Mary" in ver 46, but against this is the authority of all Gr MSS and other Lat VSS. The hymn, modeled in part on that of Hannah in 1 S 2 1 ff, is peculiarly suitable to the circumstances of Mary, and plainly could not have been composed after the actual appearance and resurrection of Christ. Its early date is thus manifest.

MAGNIFY, mag'ni-fi (Hiph. of גָּדַל, gādhal; μεγαλύνω, megalúnō, "to make great," "extol," "celebrate in praise"): Used esp. of exaltation of the name, mercy, and other attributes of God (Gen 19 19; 2 S 7 26, Ps 35 27; 40 16; 70 4; Lk 1 46; Acts 10 46); of God's "word" (Ps 138 2); or of Christ (Acts 19 17; Phil 1 20). Men also can be "magnified" (Josh 4 14; 1 Ch 29 25, etc). In Rom 11 13, "magnify mine office," the word (Gr doxázō) is changed in RV to "glorify."

MAGOG, mā'gog (מָגוֹג, māghōgh; Μαγώγ, Magōg): Named among the sons of Japheth (Gen 10 2; 1 Ch 1 5). Ezekiel uses the word as equivalent to "land of Gog" (Ezk 38 2; 39 6). Jos identifies the Magogites with the Scythians (Ant, I, vi, 1). From a resemblance between the names Gog and Gyges (Gugu), king of Lydia, some have suggested that Magog is Lydia; others, however, urge that Magog is probably only a variant of Gog (Sayce in HDB). In the Apocalypse of John, Gog and Magog represent all the heathen opponents of Messiah (Rev 20 8), and in this sense these names frequently recur in Jewish apocalyptic literature.

JOHN A. LEES

MAGOR-MISSABIB, mā'gor-mis'a-bib (מָגוֹר מִסַּבִּיב, māghōr miṣṣābhīb, "terror on every side"): A name given by Jeremiah to Pashhur ben Immer, the governor of the temple, who had caused the prophet to be beaten and set in the stocks (Jer 20 3). The same expression is used (not as a proper name) in several other passages (Ps 31 13; Jer 6 25; 20 10; 46 5; 49 29; Lam 2 22).

MAGPIASH, mag'pi-ash. See MAGBISH.

MAGUS, mā'gus, SIMON. See SIMON MAGUS; MAGI; MAGIC.

MAHALAH, ma-hā'lā, mā'ha-la (מַהֲלָה, mahlāh; RV has the correct form MAHLAH): A descendant of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 18).

MAHALALEL, ma-hā'la-lel (מַהֲלָאֵל, mahlāl'al; AV Mahalaleel, ma-hā'la-lē-cl, ma-hal'a-lēl):

(1) Son of Cainan, the grandson of Seth (Gen 5 12 ff; 1 Ch 1 2).

(2) The ancestor of Athaiah, one of the children of Judah who dwelt in Jerus after the return from exile (Neh 11 4).

MAHALATH, mā'ha-lath (מַהֲלָת, mahlāth):

(1) In Gen 28 9 the name of a wife of Esau, daughter of Ishmael, and sister of Nebaioth, called in 36 3, BASEMATH (q.v.). The Sam, however, throughout ch 36 retains "Mahalath." On the other hand, in 26 34 Basemath is said to be "the daughter of Elon the Hittite," probably a confusion with Adah, as given in 36 2, or corruption may exist in the lists otherwise.

(2) One of the 18 wives of Rehoboam, a granddaughter of David (2 Ch 11 18).

(3) The word is found in the titles of Ps 53 (RV "set to Mahalath") and Ps 88 (RV "set to Mahalath Leannoth," m "for singing"). Probably some song or tune is meant, though the word is taken by many to denote a musical instrument. Hengstenberg and others interpret it as indicating the subject of the Pss. See PSALMS. JAMES ORR

MAHALI, mā'ha-lī. See MAHLI.

MAHANAIM, mā-ha-nā'im (מַחֲנַיִם, maḥānayim; the Gr is different in every case where the name occurs, B and A also giving variant forms; the dual form may be taken as having arisen from an old locative ending, as, e.g. in מְרֻשָּׁלָה, y'rūshālā[yim], from an original מְרֻשָּׁלֵם, y'rūshālēm. In Gen 32 21 maḥāneh is evidently a || form and should be rendered as a proper name, Mahaneh, i.e. Mahanaim): The city must have been one of great strength. It lay E. of the Jordan, and is first mentioned in the history of Jacob. Here he halted after parting from Laban, before the passage of the Jabbok (Gen 32 2), "and the angels of God met him." Possibly it was the site of an ancient sanctuary. It is next noticed in defining the boundaries of tribal territory E. of the Jordan. It lay on the border of Gad and Manasseh (Josh 13 26.30). It belonged to the lot of Gad, and was assigned along with Ramoth in Gilead to the Merarite Levites (21 38; 1 Ch 6 80—the former of these passages affords no justification to Cheyne in saying [EB, s.v.] that it is mentioned as a "city of refuge"). The strength of the place doubtless attracted Abner, who fixed here the capital of Ishbosheth's kingdom. Saul's chivalrous rescue of Jabesh-gilead was remembered to the credit of his house in these dark days, and the loyalty of M. could be reckoned on (2 S 2 8, etc.). To this same fortress David fled when endangered by the rebellion of Absalom; and in the "forest" hard by, that prince met his fate (2 S 17 24, etc.). It was made the center of one of Solomon's administrative districts, and here Abinadab the son of Iddo was stationed (1 K 4 14). There seems to be a reference to M. in Cant 6 13 RV. If this is so, here alone it appears with the article. By emending the text Cheyne would read: "What do you see in the Shulammitte? A narcissus of the valleys."

It is quite clear from the narrative that Jacob, going to meet his brother, who was advancing from the S., crossed the Jabbok after leaving M. It is therefore vain to search for the site of this city S. of the Jabbok, and Conder's suggested identification with some place near el-Bukei'a, E. of es-Salī, must be given up.

On the N. of the Jabbok several positions have been thought of. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 433 ff) argues in favor of Khīrbet Saleikhat, a ruined site in the mouth of Wādī Saleikhat, on the northern bank, 3 miles E. of Jordan, and 4 miles N. of Wādī 'Ajlūn. From its height, 300 ft. above the plain, it commands a wide view to the W. and S. One running "by the way of the Plain" could be seen a great way off (2 S 18 23). This would place the battle in the hills to the S. near the Jordan valley. Ahimaaz then preferred to make a détour, thus securing a level road, while the Cushite took the rough track across the heights. Others, among them Buhl (GAP, 257), would place M. at Mihneh, a partly overgrown ruin 9 miles E. of Jordan, and 4 miles N. of 'Ajlūn on the north bank of Wādī Maḥneh. This is the only trace of the ancient name yet found in the district. It may be assumed that M. is to be sought in this neighborhood. Cheyne would locate it at 'Ajlūn, near which rises the great fortress Kal'at-Rabaḍ. He supposes that the "wood of Mahanaim" extended as far as Mihneh, and that "the name of Mihneh is really an abbreviation of the ancient phrase." Others would identify M. with Jerash, where, however, there are no remains older than Gr-Rom times.

Objections to either 'Ajlūn or Mihneh are: (1) The reference to "this Jordan" in Gen 32 10, which seems to show that the city was near the river. It may indeed be said that the great hollow of the Jordan valley seems close at hand for many miles on either side, but this, perhaps, hardly meets the objection. (2) The word kikkār, used for "Plain" in 2 S 18 23, seems always elsewhere to apply to the "circle" of the Jordan. Buhl, who identifies M. with Mihneh, yet cites this verse (GAP, 112) as a case in which kikkār applies to the plain of the Jordan. He thus prescribes for Ahimaaz a very long race. Cheyne sees the difficulty. The battle was obviously in the vicinity of M., and the nearest way from the "wood" was by the כִּקָּר, kikkār, "or, since no satisfactory explanation of this reading has been offered by the נַחַל, naḥal, that is to say, the eager Ahimaaz ran along in the wādī in which, at some little distance, M. lay" (EB, s.v.). The site for the present remains in doubt.

MAHANEH-DAN, mā'ha-ne-dan (מַחֲנֵה דָן, maḥāneh-dhān; παραμολὴ Δάν, paremōlē Dán): This place is mentioned twice: in Jgs 13 25 (AV "the camp of Dan"), and Jgs 18 12. In Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol, the spirit of the Lord began to move Samson. Here the 600 marauders of Dan, coming from Zorah and Eshtaol, encamped behind Kiriath-jearim. It has been thought that these two statements contradict each other; or at least that they cannot both apply to the same place. But if we accept the identification of Zorah with Surah, and of Eshtaol with Eshu', which there seems no reason to question; and if, further, we identify Kiriath-jearim with Khīrbet Erma, which is at least possible, the two passages may be quite reconciled. Behind Kiriath-jearim, that is W. of Khīrbet Erma, runs the Vale of Sorck, on the north bank of which, about 2 miles apart, stand Zorah and Eshtaol; the former 3½ miles, the latter 2½ miles from Khīrbet Erma. No name resembling Mahaneh-dan has yet been recovered; but the place may have lain within the area thus indicated, so meeting the conditions of both passages, whether it was a permanent settlement, or derived its name only from the incident mentioned in 18 12.

MAHARAI, ma-har'ā-i, mā'ha-rī (מַחֲרָי, maḥāray, "impetuous"): One of David's "braves" (2 S 23 28; 1 Ch 11 30; 27 13). He was one of the 12 monthly captains of David's administration, and took the 10th month in rotation. He was of the family of Zerah, and dwelt in Netophah in Judah.

MAHATH, mā'hath (מַחַת, maḥath, "snatching"; מֶת, Meth):

(1) One of the Kohathites having charge of the "service of song" in David's time, son of Amasai (1 Ch 6 35). Possibly the same as Ahimoth (ver 25). He seems also to be the same as the person named in 2 Ch 29 12 during Hezekiah's time, though it is probable there is some confusion in the narrative. He is there represented as taking part in the new covenant of Hezekiah and the cleansing of the Lord's house.

(2) One of the overseers of the temple under Conaniah and Shimei (2 Ch 31 13); three passages of Scripture give the name, but it is difficult to individuate these because the genealogy identifies the two first named (1 Ch 6 35; 2 Ch 29 12), while the chronology seems to divide them—one in David's day, the other in Hezekiah's. It is not, however, impossible to identify the man of 2 Ch 29 12 with him of 2 Ch 31 13. Possibly the genealogy has been mistakenly repeated in 2 Ch 29 12.

HENRY WALLACE

MAHAVITE, mā'ha-vit (מַחַוִּית, mahāvīm, "vil-lagers"): The description given to Eliel, one of David's warrior guard (1 Ch 11 46), perhaps to distinguish him from the Eliel in the next verse. MT is very obscure here.

MAHAZIOTH, ma-hā'zi-oth, ma-hā'zi-ōth (מַחַזִּיּוֹת, mahāzī'ōth, "visions"): One of the 14 sons of Heman the Kohathite in the temple choir. "He was leader of the 23d course of musicians whose function was to blow the horns" (1 Ch 25 4.30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, mā'hēr-shal'al-hash'baz (מַהֵר שָׁלַל חָשׁ בַּז, mahēr shālāl hash baz, "the spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth"): A symbolic name given to Isaiah's son to signify the sharp destruction of Rezin and Pekah by the Assy power (Isa 8 1.3). Cf the Gr idea of Nemesis.

MAHLAH, mā'la (מַחֲלָה, mahlāh, "sickness" or "sog," etymology doubtful):

(1) Eldest of Zelophehad's 5 daughters (Nu 26 33; 27 1). As Zelophehad, grandson of Manasseh, had no sons, the daughters successfully claimed their father's inheritance. The law was altered in their favor on condition that they married into their father's tribe. They agreed and married their cousins (Nu 36 11). The whole chapter should be read and compared with Josh 17 3 ff, because the decision became a precedent.

(2) Another (AV "Mahalah"), same Heb name as above, daughter of Hammoleketh, granddaughter of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 18).

HENRY WALLACE

MAHLI, mā'li (מַחֲלִי, mahlī, "a sick or weak one"):

(1) A son of Merari (Ex 6 19, AV Mahali; Nu 3 20), grandson of Levi and founder of the Levitical family of MAHLITES (q.v.).

(2) A son of Mushi, Mahli's brother, bears the same name (1 Ch 6 47; 23 23; 24 30). Cf Ezr 8 18 and 1 Esd 8 47.

MAHLITES, mā'lits (מַחֲלִיִּים, mahlī): Descendants of Mahli, son of Merari (Nu 3 33; 26 58). These Mahlites appear to have followed the example of the daughters of Zelophehad, mutatis mutandis. (See MAHLAH; had the name become the description of a practice?) They married the daughters of their uncle Eleazar (1 Ch 23 21.22).

MAHLON, mā'lon (מַחֲלֹן, mahlōn, "invalid"): Ruth's first husband (Ruth 1 2.5; 4 9.10). In the latter passage is further evidence of the unwillingness to allow a family connection or inheritance to drop (see MAHLAH; MAHLI). Note that David's descent and that of his "Greater Son" come through Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 4 22).

MAHOL, mā'hol (מַחֲוֹל, māhōl, "dance"; cf בְּנֵי מַחֲוֹל, b'nē-māhōl, "sons of dance"): The father of the 4 sages reputed next in wisdom to Solomon (1 K 4 31). Their names were Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, Darda.

MAHSEIAH, mā-sē'ya, mā-sī'a (מַחֲסִיָּה, mah-sēyāh, "Jeh a refuge"): Grandfather of Baruch (Jer 32 12) and of Seraiah (Jer 51 59). The name (not to be confused with MAASEIAH [q.v.] as AV has done even in the above passages) is spelt "Maaseas" (q.v.) in Bar 1 1.

MAIANNAS, mā-an'as (Μαίαννας, Maiánnas; AV Maianeas): One of the Levites who taught the law for Esdras (1 Esd 9 48) = MAASEIAH (q.v.) in Neh 8 7.

MAID, mād, MAIDEN, mād'n: Used in AV in the sense of a girl or young female; of an unmarried woman or virgin, and of a female servant or handmaid. Thus it translates several Heb words: (1) The more generic word is נַעֲרָה, na'ārāh, "girl," fem. form of the common נָעַר, na'ar, "boy" (1 S 9 11; 2 K 5 2.4; Est 2 4.7 ff; Job 41 5; Am 2 7). In several places masc. form נָעַר, na'ar, with fem. form of vb. rendered "damsel" (Gen 24 14.16.28.55; 34 3.12; Dt 22 15); cf ἡ παῖς, hē pais (Lk 8 51.54); see also παιδίσκη, paidiskē, diminutive (Sir 41 22; Mk 14 66.69; Lk 12 45; κοράσιον, korásion, LXX for nā'ārāh, "maid," in Mt 9 24 f with Job 6 12f; Sus vs 15.19). (2) The Heb נַעֲמָה, 'almāh, also rendered "maid," refers to a woman of marriageable age (Ex 2 8; Prov 30 19), whether married or not, whether a virgin or not. The same word is tr'd "virgin" in several places (Gen 24 43 AV; Cant 1 3; 6 8; Isa 7 14).

(3) The word בְּתוּלָה, b'thūlāh, a common Heb word for "virgin," a chaste woman (LXX παρθένος, parthénos), is frequently rendered "maid" and "maiden" (Ex 22 16; Jgs 19 24; 2 Ch 36 17; Ps 78 63; 148 12; Jer 51 22; Lam 5 11; Ezk 9 6; 44 22; Zec 9 17; cf Dt 22 14.17, having "the marks [tokens] of virginity"); בְּתוּלִים, b'thūlīm, rendered "maid." See VIRGIN. (4) Two Heb words covering the idea of service, handmaid, handmaid, and in numerous passages so rendered: (a) אִמָּה, 'āmāh, tr'd "maid" (Gen 30 3; Ex 2 5; 21 20.26; Lev 25 6; Ezr 2 65; Job 19 15; Nah 2 7); (b) שִׁפְחָה, shiph'hāh, "a family servant," "a handmaid," so rendered in numerous passages ("maid," "maiden" Gen 16 2 ff; 29 24.29; 30 7.9.10.12.18; Isa 24 2; Ps 123 2; Eccl 2 7). In AV they are variously tr'd "maid," "handmaid," etc. (5) The rather rare word ἀβρα, hābra, "favorite slave," is rendered "maid" in Jth 10 2.5; 13 9; 16 23; Ad Est 15 2.7. (6) δοῦλη, doūlē, "female slave," in AV Jth 12 49 (RV "servant").

Maid servant means simply a female slave in the different positions which such a woman naturally occupies. They were the property of their masters; sometimes held the position of concubines (Gen 31 33); daughters might be sold by their fathers into this condition (Ex 21 7). It is regrettable that no uniform tr was adopted in AV. And in RV of Tob 3 7; Jth 10 10; Sir 41 22.

"Maid servants" replaces "maidens" of AV in Lk 12 45. Cf Job 31 13.

MAIL, māl. See ARMOR.

MAIMED, mām'd (מַחֲרִיץ, hārūc; κλλός, kullós, ἀνάπηρος, anāpēros): The condition of being mutilated or rendered imperfect as the result of accident, in contrast to congenital malformation. An animal thus affected was declared to be unfit to be offered in sacrifice as a peace offering (Lev 22 22); although under certain conditions a congenitally deformed animal might be accepted as a free-will offering, apparently the offering of a maimed animal was always prohibited (vs 23.24). The use of such animals in sacrifice was one of the charges brought against the Jews of his time by Malachi (1 8-14). The word is also used to denote those who were so mutilated. Among those made whole by Our Lord in Galilee were the maimed as well as the halt (Mt 15 30).

Figuratively the casting off of any evil habit or distracting condition which interferes with the spiritual life is called "maiming" (Mt 18 8; Mk 9 43); with this may be taken the lesson in Mt 19 12. In these passages "maimed" (kullos) is used of injuries of the upper limb, and chōlos of those affecting the feet, rendering one halt. Hippocrates, however, uses kullos for a deformation of the legs in which the knees are bent so far outward as to render the patient lame; while he applies the term chōlos as a generic name for any distortion, and in one place uses it to describe a mutilation of the head (Prorrhētica, 83). The maimed and the halt are among the outcasts who are to be brought into the gospel feast according to the parable (Lk 14 13-21). ALEX. MACALISTER

MAINSAIL, mān'sāl. See SHIPS AND BOATS.

MAKAZ, mā'kaz (מַכָּז, mākāṣ): One of the cities of the 2d of the 12 districts or prefectures which supplied victuals for Solomon (1 K 4 9). It is associated with Shualbim, Beth-shemesh and Elon-beth-hanan, all three probably identical with cities mentioned (Josh 19 41.42) as on the border of Dan. Cheyne (EB, II, col. 2906) suggests that Makaz may be identical with MEJARGON (q.v.) in the latter list.

MAKE, māk, MAKER, māk'er (יָסַד, 'āsāh, יָצַק, nāthan, שָׁם, sūm; ποίω, poiō, τίθημι, tithēmi, καθιστήμι, kathistēmi): "Make"

1. As Used is a frequently used word, meaning in the OT "to create," "construct," "cause," "constitute," etc, and represents different Heb words. It is very often in AV (1) the tr of 'āsāh, "to do," "make," etc, usually in the sense of constructing, effecting. In Gen 1 7.16.25.31, etc, it is used of the creation; of the creation of man in the likeness of God (5 1); of the ark (6 14); of a feast (21 8); of the tabernacle and all the things belonging to it (Ex 25 8, etc); of idols (Isa 2 8; Jer 2 28, etc); (2) of nāthan (lit. "to give"), chiefly in the sense of constituting, appointing, causing; of a covenant (Gen 9 12; 17 2); of Abraham as the father of many nations, etc (17 5.6); of Ishmael as a great nation (17 20); of Moses as a god to Pharaoh (Ex 7 1); of judges and officers (Dt 16 18); of laws (Lev 26 46, etc); it has the meaning of "to cause" (Ex 18 16; 23 27; Nu 5 21; 1 S 9 22; Ps 106 46); (3) sūm, "to set," "put," "lay," has a similar significance: of Abraham's seed (Gen 13 16; 32 12); Joseph lord of all Egypt (45 9; cf Ex 2 14; Dt 1 13; 10 22); (4) shūth, with same meaning, occurs (2 S 22 12), "He made darkness pavilions round about him"; 1 K 11 34; Ps 18 11; 21 6). Other words are 'ābhadh (Aram.), "to make," "do," (Jer 10 11; Dnl 3 1); 'amadh, "to set up" (2 Ch 11 22; 25 5; Neh 10 32); 'ācabh, "to labor," etc (Job 10 8, AVm "took pains about me"); bānāh, "to build up" (Gen 2 22; 1 K 22 39); bārā, "to prepare," "create" (Nu 16 30; Ps 89 47); yāqagh, "to set up" (Job 17 6; Jer 51 34); yāqar, "to form," "constitute" (Ps 74 17; 104 26); pā'al, "to work," "make" (Ex 15 17; Ps 7 15); words with special meanings are: pā'adth, "to give a charge" (1 K 11 28; 2 K 25 23); kārath, "to cut," or "prepare," "to make a covenant or league" (Gen 15 18; Ex 24 8; Josh 9 16); kāshar, "to bind together," "to make a conspiracy" (2 K 12 20; 14 19); pārāc, "to break forth," "to make a breach" (2 S 6 8; 1 Ch 13 11; 15 13); lābhēn, "to make brick" (Gen 11 3); lābhabh (denom. of lābhābhāh), "to make cakes" (2 S 13 6.8); mālakh, "to make a king" (1 S 8 22; 12 1); among obsolete and archaic words and phrases may be mentioned, "What makest thou in this place?" (Jgs 18 3), RV "doest"; "made" for "pretend" (2 S 13 5.6),

RV "feign," "feigned"; "made as if" (Josh 8 15; 9 4), so RV; "make for him" (Ezk 17 17), RV "help him"; "make mention" (Jer 4 16); "make mention of" (Gen 40 14; Ps 87 4); "make account" (Ps 144 3); "make an end" (Jgs 3 18; 15 17); "make an end" is also "to bring to nought," "to destroy" (Isa 38 12); "make riddance" (Lev 23 22), RV "wholly reap." In 1 Macc 16 22, we have "to make him away" as tr of apolēsai autōn, RV "destroy."

Maker is the tr of 'āsāh (Job 4 17; Ps 95 6), of yāqar (Isa 45 9.11; Hab 2 18 bis), of hārāsh, "graver" (Isa 45 16), of pā'al (Job 36 3; Isa 1 31, or pō'al).

In the NT the chief word for "make" is poiō, "to do," "make," etc (Mt 3 3; Jn 2 16; 5 15); of kathistēmi, "to set down," "to appoint" (Mt 24 45.47; Rom 5 19); of in the NT tithēmi, "to set," "lay" (Mt 22 44; Mk 12 36); of diatithēmi, "to set or lay throughout" (Acts 3 25; He 8 10; 10 16); of didōmi, "to give" (2 Thess 3 9; Rev 3 9); of eimi, "to be" (Mk 12 42); of epitēlēō, "to complete" (He 8 5; Gal 3 3, "make perfect," RVm "make an end"); of kataskeuázō, "to prepare thoroughly" (He 9 2, RV "prepared"); of ktizō, "to make," "found" (Eph 2 15); of plērophorēō, "to bear on fully" (2 Tim 4 5, "make full proof of thy ministry," RV "fulfil"); doxizō, "to make honorable or glorious" (2 Cor 3 10); of peritrepō (eis manian), "to turn round to raving" (Acts 26 24, "doth make thee mad," RV "is turning thee mad," m "Gr turneth thee to madness"); of emporeuomai, "to traffic," "cheat" (2 Pet 2 3, "make merchandise of you"); of eirēnopoieō, "to make peace" (Col 1 20); of sumbállō, "to throw together" (Lk 14 31; "to make war," RV "goeth to encounter"); "made" is frequently the tr of ginomai, "to become," "begin to be" (Mt 4 3; 9 16; Mk 2 21.27; Jn 1 3 [thrice]. 10, "The world was made through him," ver 14, "The word was made flesh," RV "became flesh"; 2 9, water "made wine," RV "now become wine," m "that it had become"; 8 33, "made free"; Rom 1 3, RV "born"; Gal 3 13, RV "having become a curse for us"; 4 4, RV "born of a woman," etc; Phil 2 7, "was made in the likeness of men," RVm "Gr becoming in"; 1 Pet 2 7, etc).

In addition to the changes in RV already noted may be mentioned, for "maketh collops" (Job 15 27) "gathered fat"; for "set us in the way of his steps" (Ps 85 13), "make his footsteps a way to walk in"; for "did more grievously afflict her" (Isa 9 1), "hath made it glorious"; for "shall make him of quick understanding" (Isa 11 3), "his delight shall be in"; for "make sluices and ponds for fish" (Isa 19 10), "they that work for hire," m "or make dams"; for "ye that make mention of the Lord" (Isa 62 6), "ye that are Jeh's remembrancers"; for "he shall confirm the covenant" (Dnl 9 27), "he shall make a firm covenant"; for "maketh my way perfect" (2 S 22 33), "guideth the perfect in his way" (see margin); for "the desire of a man is his kindness" (Prov 19 22), "that which maketh a man to be desired"; for "maketh intercession" (Rom 11 2), "pleadeth"; for "hath made us accepted" (Eph 1 6), "freely bestowed on us," m "wherewith he endued us"; for "made himself of no reputation" (Phil 2 7), "emptied himself"; for "spoil you" (Col 2 8), "maketh spoil of you"; for "is the enemy of God" (Jas 4 4), "maketh himself"; for "worketh abomination or [maketh] a lie" (Rev 21 27), "maketh [m "doeth"] an abomination and a lie"; we have "become" for "made" (Mt 4 3; Lk 3 5; 4 3), "became" (Rom 10 20; 1 Cor 15 45, bis); "becoming in" for "being made" (Phil 2 7 m).

MAKEBATES, māk'bāts: This is the pl. of the word makebate, which means "one who stirs up strife." It occurs only in AVm of 2 Tim 3 3 and Tit 2 3 as an alternative tr of διάβολοι, diaboloi, which AV renders "false accusers," and RV "slanders."

MAKED, mā'ked (מַכֶּד, Makéd, Μακέδ, Makéb): A strong city E. of the Jordan, not yet identified. It is named along with Bosor, Alema and Casphor (1 Macc 5 26). In ver 36, AV reads "Maged."

MAKER, mā'kēr. See MAKE.

MAKHELOTH, mak-hē'loth, mak-hē'lōth (מַכְהֶלֶת, makhēlōth, "assemblies"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Haradah and Tahath (Nu 33 25,26). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MAKKEDAH, ma-kē'da (מַכְכֶּדָה, makkēdhāh; Μακκηδά, Makkēdā): A Canaanite royal city which Joshua captured, utterly destroying the inhabitants, and doing to the king as he had done unto the king of Jericho (Josh 10 28; 12 16). It lay in the Shephelah of Judah (15 41). It was brought into prominence by the flight thither of the 5 kings of the Amorites who, having united their forces for the destruction of Gibeon, were themselves defeated and pursued by Joshua (ch 10). Seeing their danger, the men of Gibeon sent to the camp at Gilgal beseeching Joshua to save and help them. That energetic commander marched all night with his full strength, fell upon the allies at Gibeon, slew them with a great slaughter, chased the fugitives down the valley by way of Beth-horon, and smote them unto Azekah and unto Makkedah. It was during this memorable pursuit that in response to Joshua's appeal:

"Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon;
And thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon," the sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down a whole day, until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies.

The 5 kings sought refuge in the cave at Makkedah, where, by Joshua's orders, they were blocked in with great stones, until the slaughter of the fugitives should be completed. Then the royal prisoners were brought out, and, after the chiefs of Israel had set their feet upon their necks, Joshua slew them and hanged them on five trees until sunset. This is an illustration of the old practice of impaling enemies after death. The bodies were then cast into the cave where they had sought to hide, and great stones were rolled against the entrance.

The flight of the allies was past Beth-horon and Azekah to Makkedah. Azekah is not identified, but it is named with Gederoth, Beth-dagon and Naamah (Josh 15 41). These are probably represented by Katrah, Dajān and Nā'aneh, so that in this district Makkedah may be sought. The officers of the Pal Exploration Fund agree in suggesting el-Mughār, "the cave," on the northern bank of Wādī es-Surār, about 4 miles from the sand dunes on the shore. There are traces of old quarrying and many rock-cut tombs with loculi. "The village stands on a sort of promontory stretching into the valley . . . divided into three plateaus; on the lower of these to the S. is the modern village, el-Mughār, built in front of the caves which are cut out of the sandstone" (Warren). In no other place in the neighborhood are caves found. The narrative, however, speaks not of caves, but of "the cave," as of one which was notable. On the other hand the events narrated may have lent distinction to some particular cave among the many. "The cave" would therefore be that associated with the fate of the 5 kings. No certainty is possible.

MAKTESH, mak'tesh, THE (מִכְתֶּשֶׁת, ha-makhtēsh, "the mortar"; cf Jgs 15 19, "the mortar," EV "hollow place that is in Lehi"): A quarter of Jerus so named, it is supposed, on account of the configuration of the ground and associated (Zeph 1 10,11) with the "fish gate" and MISHNEH (q.v.) or "second quarter." Most authorities think it was in the northern part of the city, and many consider that the name was derived from the hollowed-out form of that part of the Tyropæon just N. of the walls, where foreign merchants congregated; others have suggested a hollow farther W., now occupied by the muristan and the three long bazaars.

MALACHI, mal'a-kī:

1. Name of the Prophet
2. The Prophet's Times
3. Contents
4. Style
5. Message

LITERATURE

The last book of the OT. Nothing is known of the person of Malachi. Because his name does not occur elsewhere, some scholars indeed

1. Name of doubt whether "Malachi" is intended the Prophet to be the personal name of the prophet.

But none of the other prophetic books of the OT is anonymous. The form מַלְאָכִי, mal-'ākhī, signifies "my messenger"; it occurs again in 3 1; cf 2 7. But this form of itself would hardly be appropriate as a proper name without some additional syllable such as יָהּ, Yah, whence mal-'akhiah, i.e. "messenger of Yahweh." Haggai, in fact, is expressly designated "messenger of Yahweh" (Hag 1 13). Besides, the superscriptions prefixed to the book, in both the LXX and the Vulg, warrant the supposition that Malachi's full name ended with the syllable יָהּ. At the same time the LXX tr the last clause of 1 1, "by the hand of his messenger," and the Tg reads, "by the hand of my angel, whose name is called Ezra the scribe." Jerome likewise testifies that the Jews of his day ascribed this last book of prophecy to Ezra (V. Præf. in duodecim Prophetas). But if Ezra's name was originally associated with the book, it would hardly have been dropped by the collectors of the prophetic Canon who lived only a century or two subsequent to Ezra's time. Certain traditions ascribe the book to Zerubbabel and Nehemiah; others, still, to Malachi, whom they designate as a Levite and a member of the "Great Synagogue." Certain modern scholars, however, on the basis of the similarity of the title (1 1) to Zec 9 1; 12 1, declare it to be anonymous; but this is a rash conclusion without any substantial proof other than supposition. The best explanation is that of Professor G. G. Cameron, who suggests that the termination of the word "Malachi" is adjectival, and equivalent to the Lat angelicus, signifying "one charged with a message or mission" (a missionary). The term would thus be an official title; and the thought would not be unsuitable to one whose message closed the prophetic Canon of the OT, and whose mission in behalf of the church was so sacred in character (1-vol HDB).

Opinions vary as to the prophet's exact date, but nearly all scholars are agreed that Malachi prophesied during the Pers period, and after the reconstruction and dedication of the second temple in 516 BC (cf Mal 1 10; 3 1,10). The prophet speaks of the people's "governor" (Heb pehāh, Mal 1 8), as do Haggai and Nehemiah (Hag 1 1; Neh 5 14; 12 26). The social conditions portrayed are unquestionably those also of the period of the Restoration. More specifically, Malachi probably lived and labored during the times of Ezra and Nehemiah. Serious abuses had crept into Jewish life; the priests had become lax and degenerate, defective and inferior sacrifices were allowed to be offered upon the temple altar, the people were neglecting their tithes, divorce was common and God's covenant was forgotten and ignored; just such abuses as we know from the Book of Neh were common in his day (cf Neh 3 5; 5 1-13). Yet, it is doubtful whether Malachi preached during Nehemiah's active governorship; for in Mal 1 8 it is implied that gifts might be offered to the "governor," whereas Nehemiah tells us that he declined all such (Neh 5 15.18). On the other hand, the abuses which Malachi attacked correspond so exactly with those which Nehemiah found on his 2d visit to Jerus in 432 BC (Neh 13 7 ff) that it seems reasonably certain that he prophesied shortly before that date, i.e. between 445 and 432 BC. As Dr. J. M. P. Smith says, "The Book of Mal fits the situation amid which Nehemiah worked as snugly as a bone fits its socket" (ICC, 7). That the prophet should exhort the people to remember the law of Moses, which was publicly read by Ezra in the year 444 BC, is in perfect agreement with this conclusion, despite the fact that Stade, Cornill and Kautzsch argue for a date prior to the time of Ezra. On the other hand, Nägelsbach, Köhler, Orelli, Reuss and Volck rightly place the book in the period between the two visits of Nehemiah (445-432 BC).

The book, in the main, is composed of two extended polemics against the priests (1 6-2 9) and the people (2 10-4 3), opening with a clear, sharp statement of the prophet's chief thesis that Jeh still loves Israel (1 2-5), and closing with an exhortation to remember the Law of Moses (4 4-6). After the title or superscription (1 1) the prophecy falls naturally into seven divisions:

(1) 1 2-5, in which Malachi shows that Jeh still loves Israel because their lot stands in such marked contrast to Edom's. They were temporarily disciplined; Edom was forever punished.

(2) 1 6-2 9, a denunciation of the priests, the Levites, who have become neglectful of their sacerdotal office, indifferent to the Law, and unmindful of their covenant relationship to Jeh.

(3) 2 10-16, against idolatry and divorce. Some interpret this section metaphorically of Judah as having abandoned the religion of his youth (ver 11). But idolatry and divorce were closely related. The people are obviously rebuked for literally putting away their own Jewish wives in order to contract marriage with foreigners (ver 15). Such marriages, the prophet declares, are not only a form of idolatry (ver 11), but a violation of Jeh's intention to preserve to Himself a "godly seed" (ver 15).

(4) 2 17-3 6, an announcement of coming judgment. Men are beginning to doubt whether there is longer a God of justice (ver 17). Malachi replies that the Lord whom the people seek will suddenly come, both to purify the sons of Levi and to purge the land of sinners in general. The nation, however, will not be utterly consumed (3 6).

(5) 3 7-12, in which the prophet pauses to give another concrete example of the people's sins: they have failed to pay their tithes and other dues. Accordingly, drought, locusts, and famine have ensued. Let these be paid and the nation will again prosper, and their land will become "a delightful some land."

(6) 3 13-4 3, a second section addressed to the doubters of the prophet's age. In 2 17, they had said, "Where is the God of justice?" They now murmur: "It is vain to serve God; and what profit is it that we have kept his charge?" The wicked and the good alike prosper (3 14.15). But, the prophet replies, Jeh knows them that are His, and a book of remembrance is being kept; for a day of judgment is coming when the good and the evil will be distinguished; those who work iniquity will be exterminated, while those who do righteously will triumph.

(7) 4 4-6, a concluding exhortation to obey the Mosaic Law; with a promise that Elijah the prophet will first come to avert, if possible, the threatened judgment by reconciling the hearts of the nation to one another, i.e. to reconcile the ideals of the old to those of the young, and vice versa.

Malachi was content to write prose. His Hebrew is clear and forceful and direct; sometimes almost rhythmical. His figures are as numerous as should be expected in the brief remnants of his sermons which have come down to us, and in every case they are chaste and beautiful (1 6; 3 2.3.17; 4 1-3). His statements are bold and correspondingly effective. The most original feature in his style is the lecture-like method which characterizes his book throughout; more particularly that of question and answer. His style is that of the scribes. It is known as the didactic-dialectic method, consisting first of an assertion or charge, then a fancied objection raised by his hearers, and finally the prophet's refutation of their objection. Eight distinct examples of this peculiarity are to be found in his book, each one containing the same clause in Heb, "Yet ye say" (1 2.6.7; 2 14.17; 3 7.8.13). This debating style is esp. characteristic of Malachi. Ewald called it "the dialogistic" method. Malachi shows the influence of the schools (cf his use of "also" and "again" in 1 13; 2 13, which is equivalent to our "firstly," "secondly," etc).

Malachi's message has a permanent value for us as well as an immediate value for his own time. He was an intense patriot, and accordingly his message was clean-cut and severe. His primary aim was to encourage a disheartened people who were still looking for Haggai's and Zechariah's optimistic predictions to be fulfilled. Among the lessons of abiding value are the following: (1) That ritual is an important element in religion, but not as an end in itself. Tithes and offerings are necessary, but only as the expression of sincere moral and deeply spiritual life (1 11). (2) That a cheap religion avails nothing, and that sacrifices given grudgingly are displeasing to God. Better a temple closed than filled with such worshippers (1 8-10). (3) That divorce and intermarriage with heathen idolaters thwarts the purpose of God in securing to Himself a peculiar people, whose family life is sacred because it is the nursery of a "godly seed" (2 15). (4) That there is eternal discipline in the Law. Malachi places the greatest emphasis upon the necessity of keeping the Mosaic Law. The priests, he says, are the custodians and expounders of the Law. At their mouth the people should seek knowledge. "To undervalue the Law is easy; to appraise it is a much harder task" (Welch). With Malachi, no less than with Christ Himself, not one jot or tittle should ever pass away or become obsolete.

MALACHY, mal'a-kī: Another form of the name of the prophet "Malachi" (q.v.), found in RV and AV of 2 Esd 1 40.

MALCAM, mal'kam (מַלְכָּם, malkām, "their king"; AV Malcham):

(1) A chief of the Benjamites, son of Shaharaim (1 Ch 8 9).

(2) The name of an idol as well as the possessive pronominal form of מֶלֶךְ, melekh, "king" (2 S 12 30 RVm; Jer 49 1.3 [LXX Melchól]; Zeph 1 5). In Am 1 15 it appears to be best tr<sup>d</sup> "their king," as in both AV and RV. Only a careful examination of the context can determine whether the word is the proper name of the idol (Moloch) or the 3d personal possessive pronoun for king. The idol is also spelt "Milcom" and "Molech."

MALCHIAH, mal-kī'a. See MALCHIJAH.

MALCHIEL, mal'ki-el (מַלְכִּי־אֵל, malkī'ēl, "God is king"): Grandson of Asher (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 45; 1 Ch 7 31).

MALCHIELITES, mal'ki-el-its (מַלְכִּי־אֵלִיט, mal-kī'ēlī): Descendants of Malchiel (Nu 26 45).

MALCHIJAH, mal-kī'ja (מַלְכִּי־יָה, malkīyāh, "Jeh is king"; Μελχιᾱς, Melchias, with variants):

(1) A Levite, descendant of Gershom, of those whom David set over the "service of song" in the worship (1 Ch 6 40).

(2) The head of the 5th course of priests (1 Ch 24 9).

(3) One of the laymen who had taken "strange wives" during the exile (Ezr 10 25); the "Melchias" of 1 Esd 9 26.

(4) Another of the same name (Ezr 10 25; two in same verse). Called "Asibias" in 1 Esd 9 26.

(5) Another under the same offence, son of Harim (Ezr 10 31). "Melchias" in 1 Esd 9 32.

(6) One of the "repairers" who helped with the "tower of the furnaces" (Neh 3 11).

(7) Son of Rechab ruler of Beth-haccerem, repairer of the dung gate (Neh 3 14).

(8) A goldsmith who helped in building the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 31).

(9) One of those at Ezra's left hand when he read the law (though possibly one of the above [Neh 8 4]). In 1 Esd 9 44 "Melchias."

(10) One of the covenant signatories (Neh 10 3).

(11) The father of Pashhur (Neh 11 12; Jer 21 1; 38 1).

(12) A priest, a singer at the dedication of the walls of Jerus under Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 12 42).

(13) מַלְכִּי־יָהּ, malkīyāhū, as above with u ending: Son of Ham-melech (or, as 1 K 22 26; 2 Ch 28 7 translate it, "king's son"). Jeremiah was cast into his dungeon or pit (Jer 38 6).

AV spells "Malchiah" or "Malchijah" indifferently with "Melchiah" in Jer 21 1; ERV has "Malchiah" in Jer 21 1; 38 1.6, elsewhere "Malchijah"; ARV has "Malchijah" throughout.

MALCHIRAM, mal-kī'ram (מַלְכִּי־רָם, malkīrām, "uplifted king"): Son of Jeconiah, descendant of David (1 Ch 3 18).

MALCHI-SHUA, mal-kī-shōō'a (מַלְכִּי־שׁוּא, mal-kīshūā', "my king saves"): One of the sons of Saul (1 S 14 49; 31 2, AV "Melchishua"; 1 Ch 8 33; 9 39). He was slain by the Philis with his brothers at the battle of Gilboa (1 Ch 10 2; 1 S 31 2).

MALCHUS, mal'kus (Μάλχος, Málchos, from מֶלֶךְ, melekh, i.e. "counsellor" or "king"): The name of the servant of the high priest Caiaphas whose right ear was smitten off by Simon Peter at the arrest of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane (cf Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Lk 22 50; Jn 18 10). It is noteworthy that Luke "the physician" alone gives an account of the healing of the wound (Lk 22 51). As Jesus "touched his ear, and healed him," the ear was not entirely severed from the head. The words of Jesus, "Suffer ye thus far," may have been addressed either to the disciples, i.e. "Suffer ye that I thus far show kindness to my captors," or to those about to bind him, i.e. asking a short respite to heal Malchus. They were not addressed directly to Peter, as the Gr form is pl., whereas in Mt 26 52; Jn 18 11, where, immediately after the smiting of Malchus, Jesus does address Peter, the sing. form is used; nor do the words of Jesus there refer to the healing but to the action of his disciple. A kinsman of Malchus, also a servant of the high priest, was one of those who put the questions which made Peter deny Jesus (Jn 18 26). C. M. KERR

MALE, māl ([1] זָכָר, zākhār, זָכָר, zākhār, זָכִיר, zākhūr [v/ meaning "to stand out," "to be prominent," here a physiological differentiation of the sex, as נִקְבָּה, n'qēbhāh, "female," q.v.]; [2] אִשָּׁה, 'ish, lit. "man"; [3] by circumlocution, only in the books of S and K, מַשְׁתִּין בְּכִיר, mashtīn b'kīr; οὐρῶν πρὸς τοῖς ἄνδρσι, ourōn prós toichon, which RV euphemistically renders "man-child" [1 S 25 22.34; 1 K 14 10]): Gesenius has rightly pointed out that this phrase designates young boys, who do not as yet wear clothes, of whom the above description is accurate, while it does not apply in the case of adults, even in the modern Orient. We know this from the statement of Herod. ii.35, relating to Egypt, and from Jgs 3 24; 1 S 24 3. The Gr tr<sup>s</sup> these words with ἀρσεν, arsēn, ἀρρεν, arrhēn, while 1 Macc 5 28.51 has the adj. ἀρσενικός, arsenikós.

The above words (the phrase mashtīn b'kīr excepted) are used promiscuously of animals and men, e.g. "Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee seven and seven, the male ['ish] and his female, of the birds also of the heavens, seven and seven, male [zākhār] and female" (Gen 7 2.3). A careful distinction was made in the use of male and female animals in the rules concerning sacrifice; in some offerings none but males were allowed, in others females were permitted along with the males (Lev 3 6). The same distinction was made in the valuation of the different sexes (Gen 32 14.15; Lev 27 5). Certain priestly portions were permitted to the Levites or the male descendants of Aaron for food, while women were not permitted to partake of the same (Nu 18 10 11).

As a rule Jewish parents (as is now common in the Orient) preferred male children to daughters. This is seen from the desire for male progeny (1 S 1 8-18) and from the ransom paid for firstborn sons to Jeh (Ex 13 12; Lk 2 23). It was reserved to the NT to proclaim the equality of the sexes, as it does of races and conditions of men: "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female; for ye all are one man in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3 28). See WOMAN.

Among the prominent sins of oriental peoples, "the abominations of the nations which Jeh drove out before the children of Israel" was one of the most heinous character, that of sodomy, against which God's people are repeatedly warned. The Gr expression for the devotee of this vice is a compound noun, ἀρσενοκοίτης, arsenokōtēs, lit. "he who lies with man," the abuser of himself with mankind, the sodomite (1 Cor 6 9), while the Heb קֹדֶשׁ, kādhēsh, lit. means the (male) devotee of las-civious and licentious idolatry (Dt 23 17; 1 K 14 24; 15 12; 22 46; 2 K 23 7; Job 36 14).

MALEFACTOR, mal-ē-fak'tēr (κακοποιός, kakopoiós, "a bad doer," i.e. "evildoer," "criminal"; κακοῦργος, kakourgos, "a wrongdoer"): The former occurs in Jn 18 30 AV, the latter, which is the stronger term, in Lk 23 32.39. The former describes the subject as doing or making evil, the latter as creating or originating the bad, and hence designates the more energetic, aggressive, initiating type of criminality.

MALELEEL, ma-lē'lē-el, mal'ē-lēl (Μαλελεήλ, Maleleēl, AV): Gr form of "Mahalalel" (Lk 3 37); RV "Mahalaleel."

MALICE, mal'is, MALIGNITY, ma-lig'ni-ti (κακία, kakia, πονηρός, ponēros, κακοήθεια, kakoētheia): "Malice," now used in the sense of deliberate ill-will, by its derivation means badness, or wickedness generally, and was so used in Older Eng. In the Apoc it is the tr of kakia, "evil," "badness" (Wisd 12 10.20; 16 14; 2 Macc 4 50, RV "wickedness"); in Eccles 27 30; 28 7, we have "malice" in the more restricted sense as the tr of mēnis, "confirmed anger." In the NT "malice" and "maliciousness" are the tr of kakia (Rom 1 29a; 1 Cor 5 8; 14 20; Col 3 8); malicious is the tr of ponēros, "evil" (3 Jn ver 10, RV "wicked"); it also occurs in Ad Est 13 4.7, ver 4, "malignant"; Wisd 1 4, RV "that deviseth evil"; 2 Macc 5 23; malignity occurs in Rom 1 29b as the tr of kakoētheia, "evil disposition"; "maliciously." Sus vs 43.62; 2 Macc 14 11, RV "having ill will."

MALLOS, mal'os. See MALLUS.

MALLOTHI, mal'ō-thī, ma-lō'thī (מַלְלוּתִי, mallō-thī, "my discourse"): Son of Heman, a Kohathite singer (1 Ch 6 33; 25 4). The song service in the house of the Lord was apportioned by David and the captains of the host to the 3 families of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (1 Ch 25 1). Their place in the "courses" was, however, settled by "lot" (1 Ch 25 8.9). Mallothi was one of Heman's 17 children—14 sons and 3 daughters (1 Ch 25 5)—and was chief of the 19th course of twelve singers into which the temple choir was divided (1 Ch 25 26).

MALLOWS, mal'ōz. See SALT-WORT.

MALLUCH, mal'uk (מַלְלֻךְ, mallūkh, "counsellor"):

(1) A Levite of the sons of Merari, ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Ch 6 44; cf ver 29).

(2) Son of Bani, among those who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 29). He is a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 9 4) and is the Mamuchus of 1 Esd 9 30.

(3) A descendant of Harim, who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 32).

(4) (5) Two who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 4.27).

(6) Possibly the same as (4). One of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 2). Doubtless the Melicu of ver 14 m. HENRY WALLACE

MALLUCHI, mal'ū-kī (מַלְלֻכִּי, mallūkhī, "my counsellor"): A family of priests that came over with Zerubbabel (Neh 10 4; 12 14). May be the patronymic MALLUCH, (4) (q.v.).

MALLUS, mal'us (Μαλλός, Mallós; AV Mallos): A city in Cilicia, the inhabitants of which along with those of Tarsus, revolted from An-tiochus Epiphanes in protest against his action in giving them to his concubine, Antiochis (2 Macc 4 30). The ancient name was Marlos. The river Pyramos divides about 10 miles from the sea, one branch flowing to the W., the other to the E. of the low range of hills along the coast on which stands Kara-Tash. Mallus stood on a height (Strabo, 675) to the E. of the western arm, a short distance from the shore. The site is a little W. of Kara-Tash, where inscriptions of Antiocheia and Mallus have been found. Tarsus lay about 35 miles to the N.W. The two cities were rivals in trade. The position of Mallus with her harbor on the shore gave her really no advantage over Tarsus, with her river navigable to the city walls. The fine wagon road over the mountain by way of the Cilician Gates opened for her easy access to the interior, compared with that furnished for Mallus by the old caravan track to the N. by way of Adana. This sufficiently explains the greater prosperity of the former city. W. EWING

MALOBATHRON, mal-o-bath'ron: RVm suggests that this tr may be right instead of Bether in the phrase מַלְבָּתְרֹן בֵּתֵר, hārē bether (Cant 2 17). But this spice never grew wild in Pal, and so could hardly have given its name to a mountain, or mountain range. The name Bether ought therefore to be retained, notwithstanding Wellhausen (Prol., 415). The spice is the leaf of the Cassia lignea tree.

MALTANNEUS, mal-ta-nē'us (Μαλτανναῖος, Maltannaíos, B and Swete; Ἀλτανναῖος, Allannaíos, A and Fritzsche—the M being perhaps dropped because of the final M in the preceding word; AV Altaneus): One of the sons of Asom who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 33) = "Mattenai" in Ezr 10 33.

MAMAIAS, ma-mā'yas. See SAMAIAS, (3).

MAMDAI, mam'dā-ī, mam'dī (B, Μαμδαί, Mamdaí, A, Μαμδαί, Mamdaí): One of those who consented to put away their "strange wives" at Esdras' order (1 Esd 9 34) = AV "Mabdai" = "Banaiah" in Ezr 10 35.

MAMMON, mam'un (Μαμωνάς, Mamōnás): A common Aram. word (מַמּוֹן, māmōn) for riches, used in Mt 6 24 and in Lk 16 9.11.13. In these passages mammon merely means wealth, and is called "unrighteous," because the abuse of riches is more frequent than their right use. In Lk 16 13 there is doubtless personification, but there is no proof that there was in NT times a Syrian deity called Mammon. The application of the term in Mt is apparent and requires no comment. In Lk, however, since the statement, "Make to yourselves friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness," follows as a comment on the parable of the Unjust Steward, there is danger of the inference that Jesus approved the dishonest conduct of the steward and advised His disciples to imitate his example. On the contrary, the statement is added more as a corrective against this inference than as an application. 'Do not infer,' He says, 'that honesty in the use of money is a matter of indifference. He that is unfaithful in little is unfaithful in much. So if you are not wise in the use of earthly treasure how can you hope to be intrusted with heavenly treasure?' The commendation is in the matter of foresight, not in the method. The steward tried to serve two masters, his lord and his lord's creditors, but the thing could not be done, as the sequel shows. Neither can men serve both God and riches exalted as an object of slavish servitude. Wealth, Jesus teaches, does not really belong to men, but as stewards they may use wealth prudently unto their eternal advantage. Instead of serving God and mammon alike we may serve God by the use of wealth, and thus lay up treasures for ourselves in heaven. Again, the parable is not to be interpreted as teaching that the wrong of dishonest gain may be atoned for by charity. Jesus is not dealing with the question of reparation. The object is to point out how one may best use wealth, tainted or otherwise, with a view to the future.

MAMNITANEMUS, mam-ni-ta-nē-mus (Μαμνιτάναμος, Mamnitanaimos, B, Μαμνιτάναμος, Mam-nitānaimos, AV Mamnitanaimus): 1 Esd 9 34, where it represents the two names Mattaniah and Mattenai in the || Ezr 10 37, which probably represent only one person. It must be a corruption of these names. The Aldine gives a still more corrupt form, Μαμνιταναίμος, Mamnimalanaimos.

Μαμρῆ, Mambrē):

(1) In Gen 14 24 Mamre is mentioned as the name of one of Abraham's allies, who in ver 13 is described as the Amorite, brother of 1. Biblical Eshcol and Aner. The name of the Data grove of trees is evidently considered as derived from this sheikh or chieftain. The "oaks" ("terebinths") of Mamre where Abram pitched his tent (Gen 14 13; 18 1) are described (13 18) as "in Hebron." Later on MACH-PELAH (q.v.) is described as "before," i.e. "to the E. of Mamre" (Gen 23 17; 25 9; 49 30; 50 13), and Mamre is identified with Hebron itself (23 19).

While Mamre has always been looked for in the vicinity of Hebron, the traditions have varied greatly, determined apparently by the presence of a suitable tree. The one
2. Tradi- site which has a claim on grounds other tional than tradition is that called Kh. and Sites Ain Nimreh (lit. the "ruin" and "spring" of "the leopard"), about ½ mile N.N.W. of modern Hebron. The word Nimreh may be a survival of the ancient Mamre, the name, as often happens, being assimilated by a familiar word.
The site is a possible one, but, beyond this, the name has not much to commend it.

Tradition has centered round three different sites at various periods: (1) The modern tradition points to a magnificent oak (Quercus ilex, Arab. Sindian), 1½ miles W.N.W. of the modern city, as the terebinth of Abraham; its trunk has a girth of 32 ft.
It is now in a dying condition, but when Robinson visited it (BR, II, 72, 81) it was in fine condition; he mentions a Mohammedan tradition that this was "Abraham's oak." Since then the site had been bought by the Russians, a hospice and church have been erected, and the tradition, though of no antiquity, has become crystallized. (2) The second tradition, which flourished from the 16th cent. down to the commencement of the 19th cent., pointed to the hill of Deir el Arba'in (see HEBRON) as that of Mamre, relying esp., no doubt, in its inception on the identity of Mamre and Hebron (Gen 23 19). A magnificent terebinth which stood there was pointed out as that of Abraham. The site agrees well with the statement that the cave of Machpelah was "before," i.e. to the E. of Mamre (Gen 23 17, etc.). (3)
The third and much older tradition, mentioned in several Christian writers, refers to a great terebinth which once stood in an inclosure some 2 miles N. of Hebron, near the road to Jerus. It is practically certain that the site of this inclosure is the strange Rāmet el-Khalil. This is an inclosure some 214 ft. long and 162 ft. wide. The inclosing walls are made of extremely fine and massive masonry and are 6 ft. thick; the stones are very well laid and the jointing is very fine, but the building was evidently never completed. In one corner is a well—

Btr el-Khalil—lined with beautiful ashlar masonry, cut to the curve of the circumference.

It is probable that this inclosure surrounded a magnificent terebinth; if so, it was at this spot that before the days of Constantine a great annual fair was held, attended by Jews, Christians and heathen who united to pay honor to the sacred tree, while the well was on the same occasion illuminated, and offerings were made to it. Similar customs survive today at several shrines in Pal. Constantine suppressed these "superstitions," and built a church in the neighborhood, probably the so-called "Abraham's house," Beit Ibrahim of today. The tree which stood here is apparently that mentioned by Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 7) as having continued "since the creation of the world." At this inclosure, too, Jewish women and children were sold at auction

after the suppression of the revolt of Bar Cochba.
Whatever the origin of the veneration paid to this terebinth—now long centuries dead and gone—early Christian tradition associated it with Abraham and located Mamre here. This tradition is mentioned by Jerome (4th cent.), by Eucherius (6th cent.), by Areluphus (700 AD) and by Benjamin of Tudela (1163 AD). Among the modern Jews it is looked upon as the site of "Abraham's oak." It is probable that the view that Abraham was connected with this tree is one attached to it much later than its original sanctity; it was originally one of the many "holy trees" of the land venerated by primitive Sem religious feeling, and the nearness of Hebron caused the Bible story to be attached to it. Judging from the Bible data, it appears to be too far from Hebron and Machpelah to suit the conditions; the site of Mamre must have been nearer to Deir el Arba'in, but it has probably been entirely lost since very early times.

Mambré by Le R. P. Abel des Frères Prêcheurs in the Conférences de Saint Étienne, 1909-10 (Paris).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MAMUCHUS, ma-mū'kus (Μάμυχος, Mámouchos): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 30); identical with "Malluch" in Ezr 10 29.

MAN. See ANTHROPOLOGY.

MAN, NATURAL, nat'ū-ral, nach'u-ral (ψυχικός ἄνθρωπος, psuchikós anthrōpos): Man as he is by nature, contrasted with man as he becomes by grace. This phrase is exclusively Pauline.

I. Biblical Meaning.—The classical passage in which it occurs is 1 Cor 2 14 AV: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." In his anthropology Paul uses four groups of descriptive adjs in contrasted pairs: (1) the old man and the new man (Rom 6 6; Eph 4 22; Col 3 9; Eph 2 15; 4 24; Col 3 10); (2) the outward man and the inward man (2 Cor 4 16; Rom 7 22; Eph 3 16); (3) the carnal man and the spiritual man (Rom 8 1-14; 1 Cor 3 1.3.4); (4) the natural man and the spiritual man (2 Cor 2 14; 3 3.4; Eph 2 3; 1 Cor 2 15; 3 1; 14 37; 15 46; Gal 6 1). A study of these passages will show that the adjs. "old," "outward," "carnal," and "natural" describe man, from different points of view, prior to his conversion; while the adjs. "new," "inward" and "spiritual" describe him, from different points of view, after his conversion. To elucidate the meaning, the expositor must respect these antitheses and let the contrasted words throw light and meaning upon each other.

The "old man" is the "natural man" considered chronologically—prior to that operation of the Holy Spirit by which he is renovated into

1. The Old

Man

The old house is the house as it was before it was remodeled: an old garment is the garment as it was before it was re-fashioned; and the "old man" is man as he was before he was regenerated and sanctified by the grace of the Spirit. "Our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom 6 6 AV). Here the "old man" is called the "body of sin," as the physical organism is called the "body of the soul or spirit, and is to be crucified" and "destroyed," in order that man may no longer be the "servant of sin." Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt. . . . Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph 4 22.24 AV). Here the "old man" is said to be "corrupt," and we are called upon to "put it off." The figure is that of putting off old clothes which are unclean, and putting on those garments which have come from the wash clean and snowy white. We have the same idea, in different language and with a slightly different imagery, in Col 3 9.10.

When Paul calls the "natural man" the "old man," and describes it as the "body of sin" which is "corrupt," in its nature and "deeds," and tells us that it must be "crucified" and "destroyed" and "put off" in order that we may "not serve sin," but may have "righteousness" and "true holiness" and "knowledge" and the "image" of God, we get some conception of the moral meaning which he is endeavoring to convey by these contrasts (Gal 5 19-24). He has reference to that sinful nature in man which is as old as the individual, as old as the race of which he is a member, which must be graciously renovated according to that gospel which he preached to Corinthians, Colossians, Ephesians, Romans and all the world. See OLD MAN; MAN, NEW, I. 3.

The apostle also establishes a contrast between "the inward man" and "the outward man."

2. The Out- yet our inward man is renewed day ward Man by day" (2 Cor 4 16). Now what sort of man is the "outward man" as contrasted with the "inward man"? In Gr, the

ēxō-anthrōpos is set over against the ēsō-anthrōpos. See OUTWARD MAN.

"The contrast here drawn between the 'outward' and the 'inward man,' though illustrated by the contrast in Rom 7 22 between the 'law in the members' and the inner man,' and in Eph 4 22; Col 3 9 between 'the old man' and 'the new man' is not precisely the same. Those contrasts relate to the difference between the sensual and the moral nature, 'the flesh' and 'the spirit'; this to the difference between the material and the spiritual nature" (Stanley, in loc.).

"The outward man" is the body, and "the inward man" is the soul, or immaterial principle in the human make-up. As the body is wasted by the afflictions of life, the soul is renewed; what is death to the body is life to the soul; as afflictions depotentiate man's physical organism, they impotentiate man's spiritual principle. That is, the afflictions of life, culminating in death itself, have diametrically opposite effects upon the body and upon the soul. They kill the one; they quicken the other.

"The inward man" is the whole human nature as renewed and indwelt and dominated by the Spirit of God as interpenetrated by the spirit of grace. As the one is broken down by the adverse dispensations of life, the other is upbuilt by the sanctifying discipline of the Spirit.

There is another Pauline antithesis which it is necessary for us to interpret in order to understand what he means by the "natural man."

3. The It is the distinction which he draws Carnal between the "carnal mind" and the Man "spiritual mind." The critical reference is Rom 8 1-14. In this place the "carnal mind" is identified with the "law of death," and the "spiritual mind" is identified with the "law of the Spirit." These two "laws" are two principles and codes: the one makes man to be at "enmity against God" and leads to "death"; the other makes him the friend of God, and conducts to "life and peace." The word "carnal" connotes all that is fallen and sinful and unregenerate in man's nature. In its gross sense the "carnal" signifies that which is contrary to nature, or nature expressing itself in low and bestial forms of sin.

The "natural man" is the "old man," the "outward man," the "carnal man"—man as he is by nature, as he is firstborn, contrasted to man as he is changed by the Spirit, as he is second-born or regenerated. There is an "old" life, an "outward" life, a "carnal" life, a "natural" life, as contrasted with the "new" life, the "inward" life, the "spiritual" life, the "gracious" life. The "natural man" is a bold and vivid personification of that depraved nature which we inherit from Adam fallen, the source and seat of all actual and personal transgressions.

II. Theological Meaning.—We know what we mean by the nature of the lion, by the nature of the lamb. We are using perfectly comprehensible language when we speak of the lion as naturally fierce, and of the lamb when we say he is naturally gentle. We have reference to the dominant dispositions of these animals, that resultant of their qualities which defines their character and spontaneity. So we are perfectly plain when we say that man is naturally sinful. We are but saying that sinfulness is to man what fierceness is to the lion, what gentleness is to the lamb. The "natural man" is a figure of speech for that sinful human nature, common to us all. It is equivalent to the theological phrases: the "sinful inclination," the "evil disposition," the "apostate will," "original sin," "native depravity." It manifests itself in the understanding as blindness, in the heart as hardness, in the will as obstinacy. See MAN, NEW.

MAN, NEW (νέος or καινός ἄνθρωπος, néos or kainós ánthrōpos): Generally described, the "new man" is man as he becomes under the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, contrasted with man as he is by nature. The phrase has (1) its Bib., and (2) its theological, meanings.

I. Biblical Meaning.—There are four Bib. contrasts which must be considered as opposites: (1) the "old man" (palaios anthrōpos) and the "new man" (neos or kainos anthrōpos); (2) the "outward man" (éxō-anthrōpos) and the "inward man" (ésō-anthrōpos); (3) the "carnal man" (sarkikós anthrōpos) and the "spiritual man" (pneumatikós anthrōpos); (4) the "natural man" (psuchikós anthrōpos) and the "spiritual man" (pneumatikós anthrōpos). These are not four different sorts of men, but four different sorts of man. Take up these antitheses in their reverse order, so as to arrive at some clear and impressive conception of what the Bib. writer means by the "new man."

The "spiritual man" is a designation given in opposition to the "carnal man" and to the "natural man" (Rom 8 1-14; 1 Cor 2 15; 3 1.3.4; 2 14; 3 11; 14 37; 15 46; Gal 6 1; Eph 2 3). All three of these terms are personifications of human nature. The "carnal man" is human nature viewed as ruled and dominated by sensual appetites and fleshly desires—as energized by those impulses which have close association with the bodily affections. The "natural man" is human nature ruled and dominated by unsanctified reason—those higher powers of the soul not yet influenced by Divine grace. The "spiritual man" is this same human nature after it has been seized upon and interpenetrated and determined by the Holy Spirit. The word "spiritual" is sometimes used in a poetic and idealistic sense, as when we speak of the spirituality of beauty; sometimes in a metaphysical sense, as when we speak of the spirituality of the soul; but in its prevalent Bib. and evangelical sense it is an adj. with the Holy Spirit as its noun-form. The spiritual life is that life of which the Holy Spirit is the author and preserver; and the "spiritual man" is that nature or character in man which the Holy Spirit originates, preserves, determines, disciplines, sanctifies and glorifies.

The "inward man" is a designation of human nature viewed as internally and centrally regenerated, as contrasted with the "out-

2. The Inward Man ward man" (2 Cor 4 16; Rom 7 22; Eph 3 16). See MAN, OUTWARD.

This phrase indicates the whole human nature conceived as affected from within—in the secret, inside, and true springs of activity—by the Holy Spirit of God. Such a change—regeneration—is not superficial, but a change in the inner central self; not a mere external reformation, but an internal transformation. Grace operates not from the circumference toward the center, but from the center toward the circumference, of life. The product is a man renovated in his "inward parts," changed in the dynamic center of his heart.

The "new man" is an appellation yielded by the contrasted idea of the "old man" (Rom 6 6; Eph 4 22; Col 3 9; Eph 2 15; 4 24; Col 3

3. The New Man 10). The "old" is "corrupt" and expresses itself in evil "deeds"; the "new" possesses the "image of God" and is marked by "knowledge," "righteousness," and "holiness." There are two Gr words for "new"—neos and kainos. The former means new in the sense of young, as the new-born child is a young thing; the latter means "new" in the sense of renovated, as when the house which has been rebuilt is called a new house. The converted man is "new"

(neo-anthrōpos) in the sense that he is a "babe in Christ," and "new" (kaino-anthrōpos) in the sense that his moral nature is renovated and built over again.

In the NT there are 5 different vbs. used to express the action put forth in making the "old man" a "new man." (1) In Eph 2 10 and 4 24, he is said to be "created" (ktizō), and in 2 Cor 5 17 the product is called a "new creature" (kainē kisis), a renovated creature. Out of the "old man" the Holy Spirit has created the "new man." (2) In 1 Pet 1 3.23 and elsewhere, he is said to be "begotten again" (anagennāō), and the product is a "babe in Christ" (1 Cor 3 1). The "old man" thus becomes the "new man" by a spiritual begetting: his pater-nity is assigned to the Holy Ghost. (3) In Eph 2 5 and elsewhere, he is said to be "quickened" (zōopoieō), and the product is represented as a creature which has been made "alive from the dead" (Rom 6 13). The "old man," being 'dead in trespasses and sins' (Eph 2 1), is brought forth from his sin-grave by a spiritual resurrection. (4) In Eph 4 23 he is represented as being made "young" (ananeōō), and the product is a child of the Spirit at the commencement of his religious experience. The "old man," dating his history back to the fall in Eden, has become, through the Spirit, a young man in Christ Jesus. (5) In 2 Cor 4 16 and in Rom 12 2, he is said to be 'renovated' (anakainōō). The "old man" is renovated into the "new man." Sinful human nature is taken by the Spirit and morally recast.

II. Theological Meaning.—The "new man" is the converted, regenerated man. The phrase has its significance for the great theological doctrine of regeneration as it expands into the broad work of sanctification. Is the sinner dead? Regeneration is a new life. Is holiness non-existent in him? Regeneration is a new creation. Is he born in sin? Regeneration is a new birth. Is he determined by his fallen, depraved nature? Regeneration is a spiritual determination. Is he the subject of carnal appetites? Regeneration is a holy appetency. Is he thought of as the old sinful man? Regeneration is a new man. Is the sinful mind blind? Regeneration is a new understanding. Is the heart stony? Regeneration is a heart of flesh. Is the conscience seared? Regeneration is a good conscience. Is the will impotent? Regeneration is a new impotentiation. The regenerated man is a man with a new governing disposition—a "new man," an "inward man," a "spiritual man."

(1) The "new man"—the regenerate man—is not a theological transubstantiation: a being whose substance has been supernaturally converted into some other sort of substance.

(2) He is not a scientific transmutation: a species of one kind which has been naturally evolved into a species of another kind.

(3) He is not a metaphysical reconstruction: a being with a new mental equipment.

(4) He is an evangelical convert: an "old man" with a new regnant moral disposition, an "outward man" with a new inward font et origo of moral life; a "natural man" with a new renovated spiritual heart. See MAN, NATURAL; REGENERATION.

MAN OF SIN (ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀμαρτίας, ho ánthrōpos tēs hamartias; many ancient authorities read, "man of lawlessness," ἀνομίας,

1. The Pauline Description anómias): The name occurs in Paul's remarkable announcement in 2 Thess 2 3-10 of the manifestation of a colossal anti-Christian power prior to the advent, which some of the Thessalonians had been misled into thinking of as immediately impending (ver 2). That "day of the Lord," the apostle declares, will not come till, as he had previously taught them (ver 5), there has first been a great apostasy and the revelation of "the man of sin" (or "of lawlessness"; cf ver 8), named also "the son of perdition" (ver 3). This "lawless one" (ver 8) would exalt himself above all that is called God, or is an object of worship; he would sit in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God (ver 4). For the time another power restrained his manifestation; when that was removed, he would be revealed (vs 6.7). Then "the mystery of lawlessness," which was already working, would attain its full development (vs 7.8). The coming of this "man of sin," in the power of Satan, would be with lying wonders and all deceit of unrighteousness, whereby many would be deceived to their destruction (vs 9.10). But only for a season (ver 6). Jesus would slay (or consume) him with the breath of His mouth (cf Isa 11 4), and bring him to nought by the manifestation of His coming (ver 8).

Innumerable are the theories and speculations to which this Pauline passage has given rise (a very full account of these may be seen in the essay on "The Man of Sin" appended to Dr. J. Eadie's posthumous Comm. on Thess. and in Lünemann's Comm., 222 ff, ET).

2. The Varying Interpretations There is the view, favored by "moderns," that the passage contains no genuine prediction (Paul "could not know" the future), but represents a speculation of the apostle's own, based on Dnl 8 23 ff; 11 36 ff, and on current ideas of Antichrist (see ANTICHRIST; BELIAL; cf Bousset, Der Antichrist, 93 ff, etc). This view will not satisfy those who believe in the reality of Paul's apostleship and inspiration. (2) Some connect the description with Caligula, Nero, or other of the Rom emperors. Caligula, indeed, ordered supplication to be made to himself as the supreme god and wished to set up his statue in the temple of Jerus (Suct. Calig. xxii.33; Jos, Ant. XVIII, viii). But this was long before Paul's visit to Thessalonica, and the acts of such a madman could not furnish the basis of a prediction so elaborate and important as the present (cf Lünemann and Bousset). (3) The favorite Protestant interpretation refers the prediction to the papacy, in whom, it is contended, many of the blasphemous features of Paul's representation are unmistakably realized. The "temple of God" is here understood to be the church; the restraining power the Rom empire; "the man of sin" not an individual, but the personification of an institution or system. It is difficult, however, to resist the impression that the apostle regards "the mystery of lawlessness" as culminating in an individual—a personal Antichrist—and in any case the representation outstrips everything that can be conceived of as even nominally Christian. (4) There remains the view held by most of the Fathers, and in recent times widely adopted, that "the man of sin" of this passage is an individual in whom, previous to the advent, sin will embody itself in its most lawless and God-denying form. The attempts to identify this individual with historical characters may be set aside; but the idea is not thereby invalidated. The difficulty is that the apostle evidently conceives of the manifestation of the "man of sin" as taking place, certainly not immediately, but at no very remote period—not 2,000 years later—and as connected directly with the final advent of Christ, and the judgment on the wicked (cf 1 7-9), without apparently any reference to a "millennial" period, either before or after.

It seems safest, in view of the difficulties of the passage, to confine one's self to the general idea it embodies, leaving details to be interpreted by the actual fulfilment. There is much support in Scripture—not least in Christ's own teaching (cf Mt 13 30.37-43; 24 11-14; Lk 18 8)—for the belief that before the final triumph of Christ's kingdom there will be a period of great tribulation, of decay of faith, of apostasy, of culmination of both good and evil ("Let both grow together until the harvest," Mt 13 30), with the seeming triumph for the time of the evil over the good. There will be a crisis-time—sharp, severe, and terminated by a decisive interposition of the Son of Man ("the manifestation of his coming," RVm "Gr presence"), in what precise form may be left undetermined. Civil law and government—the existing bulwark against anarchy (in Paul's time represented by the Rom power)—will be swept away by the rising tide of evil, and lawlessness will prevail. It may be that impiety will concentrate itself, as the passage says, in some individual head; or this may belong to the form of the apostle's apprehension in a case where "times and seasons" were not yet fully revealed: an apprehension to be enlarged by subsequent revelations (see REVELATION, BOOK OF), or left to be corrected by the actual course of God's providence. The kernel of the prediction is not, any more than in the OT prophecies, dependent on its literal realization in every detail. Neither does the final manifestation of evil exclude partial and anticipatory realizations, embodying many of the features of the prophecy. See THESSALONIANS, SECOND EPISTLE to, III. JAMES ORR

MANAEN, man'a-en (Μανᾶν, Manān, Gr form of Heb name "Menahem," meaning "consoler"): Manaen is mentioned, with Barnabas, Saul and others, in Acts 13 1, as one of the "prophets and teachers" in the recently founded gentile church at Antioch, at the time when Barnabas and Saul were "separated" by Divine call for their missionary service. He is further described as "the foster-brother [súntrophos] of Herod the tetrarch" (i.e. HEROD ANTIPAS [q.v.]). He was probably brought up and educated with this Herod and his brother Archelaus. An earlier glimpse of Christian influence in Herod's court is afforded by Joanna, the wife of Herod's steward Chuzas, among the holy women who ministered to Jesus (Lk 8 3). Manaen may have been related to the older Manaen, the Essene, who, Jos tells us, foretold the greatness of Herod the Great, and was afterward treated by Herod as his friend (Ant. XV, x, 5). His position in the church at Antioch was evidently an influential one, whether he himself ranked among the "prophets," or perhaps only among the "teachers." JAMES ORR

MANAHATH, man'a-hath (מָנַחַת, mānahath; Μαχάθ, Machath):

(1) A place to which certain Benjamites, victims, apparently, of intra-tribal jealousy, were carried captive (1 Ch 8 6). Of this town the Manahathites were probably natives. It is possibly denoted by Mancho which LXX adds to the list of towns in Judah (Josh 15 59). This place is named along with Bether (Billir). The name seems to be preserved in that of Māliha, a large village not far from Billir, S.W. of Jerus. The change of l to n, and vice versa, is not uncommon. The same place may be intended by Menuhah (Jgs 20 43

(2) One of the sons of Shobal, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40), the "name-father" of one of the ancient tribes in Mt. Seir, afterward subdued and incorporated in Edom.

MANAHATHITES, man'a-hath-its (מְנַחֲתִי, mənūhōth [1 Ch 2 52], מְנַחֲתִי, mānahī [ver 54]; B, Mōnaō, Mōnaōd, A, Ammanīth, Ammanīth [ver 52]; B, Malathēi, Malathēi, A, Mavāō, Manāth, [ver 54]; AV Manahethites): These men were the inhabitants of Manahath. They were descendants of Caleb, one-half being the progeny of Shobal, and the other of Salma. In ver 52 RV transliterates "Menuhoth," but Manahathites is preferable.

MANAHETHITES, man-a-hē'thīts, ma-nā'heth-its. See MANAHATHITES.

MANASSEAS, man-a-sē'as (Μανασσᾶς, Manassās): One of those who had married "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 31); "Manassch" of Ezr 10 30.

MANASSEH, ma-nas'e (מְנַשֶּׁה, m'nashsheh, "causing to forget"; cf Gen 41 51; Mav[ν]assōh, Man[n]assē):

(1) The firstborn of Joseph by Asenath, daughter of Poti-pher, priest of On. See next article.

(2) The tribe named from Manasseh, half of which, with Gad and Reuben, occupied the E. of Jordan (Nu 27 1, etc). See next article.

(3) The "Manasseh" of Jgs 18 30.31 AV is really an intentional mistake for the name Moses. A small nūn (n) has been inserted over and between the first and second Heb letters in the word Moses, thus מֹשֶׁה for מֹשֶׁה. The reason for this is that the individual in question is mentioned as priest of a brazen image at Dan. His proper name was Moses. It was felt to be a disgrace that such a one bearing that honored name should keep it intact. The insertion of the nūn hides the disgrace and, moreover, gives to the person a name already too familiar with idolatrous practices; for King Manasseh's 55 years of sovereignty were thus disgraced.

(4) King of Judah. See separate article.

(5) Son of PAHATH-MOAB (q.v.), who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). Manasseas in 1 Esd 9 31.

(6) The Manasses of 1 Esd 9 33. A layman of the family of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's order (Ezr 10 33).

In RV of Mt 1 10 and Rev 7 6 the spelling "Manassch" is given for AV "Manasses." The latter is the spelling of the husband of Judith (Jth 8 2 7; 10 3; 16 22.23.24); of a person named in the last words of Tobit and otherwise unknown (Tob 14 10), and also the name given to a remarkable prayer probably referred to in 2 Ch 33 18, which Manassch (4) is said to have uttered at the end of his long, unsatisfactory life. See MANASSES, PRAYER OF. In Jgs 12 4, RV reads "Manassch" for AV "Manassites." HENRY WALLACE

MANASSEH: Following the Bib. account of Manasseh (patriarch, tribe, and territory) we find that he was the elder of Joseph's two

1. Son of sons by Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pher, priest of On (Gen 41 51).

The birth of a son marked the climax of Joseph's happiness after the long bitterness of his experience. In the joy of the moment, the dark years past could be forgotten; therefore he called the name of the firstborn Manasseh ("causing to forget"), for, said he, God hath made me to forget all my toil. When Jacob was near his end, Joseph brought his two sons to his father who blessed them. Himself the younger son who had received the blessing of the firstborn, Jacob preferred Ephraim, the second son of Joseph, to M. his elder brother, thus indicating the relative positions of their descendants (Gen 48). Before Joseph died he saw the children of Machir the son of M. (50 23). Machir was born to M. by his concubine, an Aramite (1 Ch 7 14). Whether he married Maacah before leaving for Egypt is not said. She was the sister of Huppim and Shuppim. Of M.'s personal life no details are recorded in Scripture. According to Jewish tradition he became steward of his father's house, and acted as interpreter between Joseph and his brethren.

At the beginning of the desert march the number of M.'s men of war is given at 32,200 (Nu 1 34 f).

At the 2d census they had increased to 52,700 (26 34). Their position in the wilderness was with the tribe of Benjamin, by the standard of the tribe of Ephraim, on the W. of the tabernacle. According to Tg Pseudojon, the standard was the figure of a boy, with the inscription "The cloud of Jeh rested on them until they went forth out of the camp." At Sinai the prince of the tribe was Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur (Nu 2 20). The tribe was represented among the spies by Gaddi, son of Susi (13 11, where the name "tribe of Joseph" seems to be used as an alternative). At the census in the plains of Moab, M. is named before Ephraim, and appears as much the stronger tribe (26 28 ff). The main military exploits in the conquest of Eastern Pal were performed by Manassites. Machir, son of M., conquered the Amorites and Gilead (32 39). Jair, son of M., took all the region of Argob, containing three score cities; these he called by his own name, "Havvoth-jair" (32 41; Dt 3 4 14). Nobah captured Kenath and the villages thereof (Nu 32 42; Josh 17 1.5). Land for half the tribe was thus provided, their territory stretching from the northern boundary of Gad to an undetermined frontier in the N., marching with Geshur and Maacah on the W., and with the desert on the E. The warriors of this half-tribe passed over with those of Reuben and Gad before the host of Israel, and took their share in the conquest of Western Pal (Josh 22). They helped to raise the great altar in the Jordan valley, which so nearly led to disastrous consequences (22 10 ff). Golan, the city of refuge, lay within their territory.

The possession of Ephraim and Manasseh W. of the Jordan appears to have been undivided at first (Josh 17 16 ff). The portion which ultimately fell to M. marched with Ephraim on the S., with Asher and Issachar on the N., running out to the sea on the W., and falling into the Jordan valley on the E. (17 7 ff). The long dwindling slopes to westward and the flat reaches of the plain included much excellent soil. Within the territory of Issachar and Asher, Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, Endor, Taanach and Megiddo, with their villages, were assigned to M. Perhaps the men of the West lacked the energy and enterprise of their eastern brethren. They failed, in any case, to expel the Canaanites from these cities, and for long this grim chain of fortresses seemed to mock the strength of Israel (Josh 17 11 ff).

Ten cities W. of the Jordan, in the portion of M., were given to the Levites, and 13 in the eastern portion (Josh 21 5 6).

M. took part in the glorious conflict with the host of Sisera (Jgs 5 14). Two famous judges, Gideon and Jephthah, belonged to this tribe. The men of the half-tribe E. of Jordan were noted for skill and valor as warriors (1 Ch 5 18.23 f). Some men of

M. had joined David before the battle of Gilboa (1 Ch 12 19). Others, all mighty men of valor, and captains in the host, fell to him on the way to Ziklag, and helped him against the band of rovers (vs 20 ff). From the half-tribe W. of the Jordan 18,000 men, expressed by name, came to David at Hebron to make him king (ver 31); while those who came from the E. numbered, along with the men of Reuben and Gad, 120,000 (ver 37). David organized the eastern tribes under 2,700 overseers for every matter pertaining to God and for the affairs of the king (26 32). The rulers of M. were, in the W., Joel, son of Pedaiiah, and in the E., Iddo, son of Zechariah (27 20,21). Divers of M. humbled themselves and came to Jerus at the invitation of Hezekiah to celebrate the Passover (2 Ch 30 11). Although not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary, they ate the Passover. Pardon was successfully sought for them by the king, because they set their hearts to seek God (vs 18 ff).

3. Its Place in Later History

Of the eastern half-tribe it is said that they went a-whoring after the gods of the land, and in consequence they were overwhelmed and expatriated by Pul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria (1 Ch 5 25 f). Reference to the idolatries of the western half-tribe are also found in 2 Ch 31 1; 34 6.

There is a portion for M. in Ezekiel's ideal picture (48 4), and the tribe appears in the list in Rev (7 6).

The genealogies in Josh 17 1 ff; Nu 26 28-34; 1 Ch 2 21-23; 7 14-19 have fallen into confusion. As they stand, they are mutually contradictory, and it is impossible to harmonize them.

The theories of certain modern scholars who reject the Bib. account are themselves beset with difficulties; e.g. the name is derived from the Arab. nasa, "to injure a tendon of the leg." M., the Piel part., would thus be the name of a supernatural being, of whom the infliction of such an injury was characteristic. It is not clear which of the wrestlers at the Jabok suffered the injury. As Jacob is said to have prevailed with gods and men, the suggestion is that it was his antagonist who was lamed. "It would appear therefore that in the original story the epithet Manasseh was a fitting title of Jacob himself, which might be borne by his worshippers, as in the case of Gad" (EB, s.v., par. 4).

It is assumed that the mention of Machir in Jgs 5 14 definitely locates the Manassites at that time on the W. of the Jordan. The raids by members of the tribe on Eastern Pal must therefore have taken place long after the days of Moses. The reasoning is precarious. After the mention of Reuben (vs 15,16), Gilead (ver 17) may refer to Gad. It would be strange if this warlike tribe were passed over (Guthrie). Machir, then probably the strongest clan, stands for the whole tribe, and may be supposed to indicate particularly the noted fighters of the eastern half.

In dealing with the genealogies, "the difficult name" Zelophehad must be got rid of. Among the suggestions made is one by Dr. Cheyne, which first supposes the existence of a name Salhad, and then makes Zelophehad a corruption of this.

The genealogies certainly present difficulties, but otherwise the narrative is intelligible and self-consistent without resort to such questionable expedients as those referred to above.

MANASSEH: A king of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah; reigned 55 years (2 K 21 1; 2 Ch 33 1), from c 685 onward. His was one of the few royal names not compounded with the name of Jeh (his son Amon's was the only other if, as an Assyrian inscription gives it, the full name of Ahaz was Jehoahaz or Ahaziah); but it was no heathen name like Amon, but identical with that of the elder son of Joseph. Born within Hezekiah's added 15 years, years of trembling faith and tender hope (cf Isa 38 15 f), his name may perhaps memorialize the father's sacred feelings; the name of his mother Hephzibah too was used long afterward as the symbol of the happy union of the land with its loyal sons (Isa 62 4). All this, however, was long forgotten in the memory of Manasseh's apostate career.

I. Sources of His Life.—The history (2 K 21 1-18) refers for "the rest of his acts" to "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah," but the body of the account, instead of reading like state annals, is almost entirely a censure of his idolatrous reign in the spirit of the prophets and of the Deuteronomic strain of literature. The parallel history (2 Ch 33 1-20) puts "the rest of his acts" "among the acts of the kings of Israel," and mentions his prayer (a prayer ascribed to him is in the Apocrypha) and "the words of the seers that spoke to him in the name of Jeh." This history of Ch mentions his captive journey to Babylon and his repentance (2 Ch 33 10-13), also his building operations in Jerus and his resumption of Jeh-worship (vs 14-17), which the earlier source lacks. From these sources, which it is not the business of this article either to verify or question, the estimate of his reign is to be deduced.

1. Political Situation banipal, was at the height of its arrogance and power; and his long reign was the peaceful and uneventful life of a willing vassal, contented to count as tributary king in an illustrious world-empire, hospitable to all its religious and cultural ideas, and ready to take his part in its military and other enterprises. The two mentions of his name in Assyrian inscriptions (see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 182) both represent him in this tributary light. His journey to Babylon mentioned in 2 Ch 33 11 need not have been the penalty of rebellion; more likely it was such an enforced act of allegiance as was perhaps imposed on all provincial rulers who had incurred or would avert suspicion of disloyalty. Nor was his fortification of Jerus after his return less necessary against domestic than foreign aggression; the more so, indeed, as in so long and undisturbed a reign his capital, which was now practically synonymous with his realm (Esar-haddon calls him "king of the city of Judah"), became increasingly an important center of wealth and commercial prosperity. Of the specific events of his reign, however, other than religious, less is known than of almost any other.

That the wholesale idolatry by which his reign is mainly distinguished was of a reactionary and indeed conservative nature may be

2. Reaction-ary Idolatry understood alike from what it sought to maintain and from what it had to react against. On the one side was the tremendous wave of ritual and mechanical heathen cultus which, proceeding from the world-centers of culture and civilization (cf Isa 2 6-8), was drawing all the tributary lands, Judah with the rest, into its almost irresistible sweep. M., it would seem, met this not in the temper of an amateur, as had his grandfather Ahaz, but in the temper of a fanatic. Everything old and new that came to his purview was of momentous religious value—except only the simple and austere demands of prophetic insight. He restored the debasing cultus of the aboriginal Nature-worship which his father had suppressed, thus making Judah revert to the sterile Baal-cultus of Ahab; but his blind credence in the black arts so prevalent in all the surrounding nations, imported the elaborate worship of the heavenly bodies from Babylon, invading even the temple-courts with its numerous rites and altars; even went to the horrid extreme of human sacrifice, making an institution of what Ahaz had tried as a desperate expedient. All this, which to the matured prophetic sense was headlong wickedness, was the mark of a desperately earnest soul, seeking blindly in this wholesale way to propitiate the mysterious Divine powers, his nation's God among them, who seemed so to have the world's affairs in their inscrutable control. On the other side, there confronted him the prophetic voice of a religion which decried all insincere ritual ('wickedness and worship,' Isa 1 13), made straight demands on heart and conscience, and had already vindicated itself in the faith which had wrought the deliverance of 701. It was the fight of the decadent formal against the uprising spiritual; and, as in all such struggles, it would grasp at any expedient save the one plain duty of yielding the heart to repentance and trust.

Meanwhile, the saving intelligence and integrity of Israel, though still the secret of the lowly, was making itself felt in the spiritual movement that Isaiah had labored to promote; through the permeating influence of literature and education the "remnant" was becoming a power to be reckoned with. It is in the nature of things that such an innovating movement must encounter persecution; the significant thing is that already there was so much to persecute. Persecution is as truly the offspring of fear as of fanaticism. M's persecution of the prophets and their adherents (tradition has it that the aged Isaiah was one of his victims) was from their point of view an enormity of wickedness. To us the analysis is not quite so simple; it looks also like the antipathy of an inveterate formal order to a vital movement that it cannot understand. The vested interests of almost universal heathenism must needs die hard, and "much innocent blood" was its desperate price before it would yield the upper hand. To say this of M's murderous zeal is not to justify it; it is merely to concede its sadly mistaken sincerity. It may well have seemed to him that a nation's piety was at stake, as if a world's religious culture were in peril.

The Chronicler, less austere in tone than the earlier historian, preserves for us the story that, like Saul of Tarsus after him, M. got his eyes open to the truer meaning of things; that after his humiliation and repentance in Babylon he "knew that Jeh he was God" (2 Ch 33 10-13).

He had the opportunity to see a despotic idolatry, its evils with its splendors, in its own home; a first-fruit of the thing that the Heb exiles were afterward to realize. On his return, accordingly, he removed the altars that had encroached upon the sacred precincts of the temple, and restored the ritual of the Jeh-service, without, however, removing the high places. It would seem to have been merely the concession of Jeh's right to a specific cultus of His own, with perhaps a mitigation of the more offensive extremes of exotic worship, while the toleration of the various fashionable forms remained much as before. But this in itself was something, was much; it gave Jeh His chance, so to say, among rivals; and the growing spiritual fiber of the heart of Israel could be trusted to do the rest. It helps us also the better to understand the situation when, only two years after M's death, Josiah came to the throne, and to understand why he and his people were so ready to accept the religious sanity of the Deuteronomic law. He did not succeed, after all, in committing his nation to the wholesale sway of heathenism. M's reactionary reign was indeed not without its good fruits; the crisis of religious syncretism and externalism was met and passed.

JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

MANASSES, ma-nas'ez (Μανασσῆς, Manassēs, B, Manassē):

(1) One who had married a "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 33) = "Manasseh" of Ezr 10 33.

(2) The wealthy husband of Judith; died of sunstroke when employed at the barley harvest (Jth 8 2 f.7; 10 3; 16 22 ff.).

(3) A person mentioned in Tob 14 10, who "gave alms, and escaped the snare of death." It must be admitted that Manasses here is an awkward reading and apparently interrupts the sense, which would run more smoothly if Manasses were omitted or Achiacharus read. There is great variety of text in this verse. ✠ (followed by Fritzsche, Libri apoc. vet. Test Gr., 1871) reads en tō poiēsai me eleēmosinēn exēllēn, where Manasses is omitted and Achiacharus is understood as the subject. Itala and Syr go a step further and read Achiacharus as subject. But B (followed by Swete, AV and RV) reads Manassēs, which must be the correct reading on the principle of being the most difficult. Explanations have been offered (1) that Manasses is simply the Heb name for Achiacharus, it not being uncommon for a Jew to have a Gr and a Heb name; (2) that on reading Ἀμὼν, Ἀμόν, Manasses was inserted for Achiacharus according to 2 Ch 33 22 ff; (3) that M. here is an incorrect reading for Nasbas (Tob 11 18), identified by Grotius with Achiacharus. "It seems impossible at present to arrive at a satisfactory explanation" (Fuller, Speaker's Comm.). There is as great uncertainty as to the person who conspired against Manasses: Ἀμὼν, Ἀμάν, in A, followed by AV and RV, who is by some identified with the Haman of Est and Achiacharus with Mordecai; Ἀδάμ, Ἀδάμ, in B, followed by Swete; Itala Nadab; Syr Ahab (Acab).

(4) A king of Judah (Mt 1 10 AV, Gr form, RV "Manasseh"), whose prayer forms one of the apocryphal books. See MANASSES, PRAYER OF.

(5) The elder son of Joseph (Rev 7 6, AV Gr form, RV "Manasseh"). S. ANGUS

LITERATURE

The Prayer of Manasses purports to be, and may in reality be, the prayer of that king mentioned in 2 Ch 33 13.18 f.

In Cod. A it is called simply "A Prayer of Manasses," in the London Polyglot "A Prayer of Manasses, King of the Jews." Its title

1. Name in the Vulg is "A Prayer of Manasses, King of Judah, when He Was Held Captive in Babylon." In Baxter's Apoc. Gr and Eng. this Prayer appears at the end with the heading "A Prayer of Manasses, son of Ezekias" (= Hezekiah).

The Greek church is the only one which has consistently reckoned this Prayer as a part of its Bible.

2. Canon- Up to the time of the Council of Trent (1545-63 AD), it formed a part of the icity and Vulg, but by that council it was Position egeated with 3 and 4 (1 and 2) Esd to the appendix (which included uncanonical scriptures), "lest they should become wholly lost, since they are occasionally cited by the Fathers and are found in printed copies." Yet it is wholly absent from the Vulg of Sixtus V, though it is in the Appendix of the Vulg of Clement VIII. Its position varies in MSS, VSS and printed editions of the LXX. It is most frequently found among the odes or canticles following the Psalter, as in Codd. A, T (the Zurich Psalter) and in Ludolf's Ethiopic Psalter. In Swete's LXX the Ps Sol followed by the odes ('Ōdat, 'Ōdat'), of which Pr Man is the 8th, appear as an Appendix after 4 Macc in vol III. It was placed after 2 Ch in the original Vulg, but in the Romanist Vulg it stands first, followed by 3 and 4 (1 and 2) Esd in the apocryphal Appendix. It is found in all MSS of the Armenian Bible, where, as in Swete's LXX, it is one of many odes. Though not included in Coverdale's Bible or the Geneva VS, it was retained (at the close of the Apoc) in Luther's tr, in Mathew's Bible and in the Bishops' Bible, whence it passed into our EV.

According to 2 Ch 33 (cf 2 K 21) Manasseh was exiled by the Assyrians to Babylon as a punishment for his sins. There he became 3. Contents penitent and earnestly prayed to God for pardon and deliverance. God answered his prayer and restored him to Jerus and to the throne. Though the prayer is mentioned in 2 Ch 33 13.18 f, it is not given, but this lack has been supplied in the Pr Man of the Apoc. After an opening invocation to the God of Abraham, Isaac, Judah and their righteous seed, the Creator of all things, most high, yet compassionate, who has ordained repentance, not for perfect ones like the patriarchs who did not need it, but for the like of the person praying, there follows a confession of sin couched for the most part in general terms, a prayer for pardon and a vow to praise God forever if this prayer is answered.

The bulk of scholars (Fritzsche, Reuss, Schürer, Ryssel, etc) agree that this Prayer was composed in Gr. The Gr recension is written there are some Hebraisms, they are not more numerous or striking than usually meet us in Hellenistic Gr. It is of some importance also that, although Jewish tradition adds largely to the legends about Manasseh, it has never supplied a Heb VS of the Prayer (see TEXT AND VERSIONS, VIII). On the other hand, Ewald (Hist. Isr, I, 186; IV, 217, n.5, Ger. ed, IV, 217 f), Fürst (Gesch. der bibl. Lit., II, 399), Budde (ZAW, 1892, 39 ff), Ball (Speaker's Apoc) and others argue for a Heb original, perhaps existing in the source named of 2 Ch 33 18 f (see Ryssel in Kautzsch, Die Apoc des AT, 167).

Have we here the authentic prayer of Manasseh offered under the circumstances described in 2 Ch 33? Ewald and the other scholars named (see fore-probably here a Gr rendering of the Heb original which the Chronicler saw in his source. Ball, on the other hand, though not greatly opposed to this view, is more convinced that the Heb original is to be sought in a haggadic narrative concerning Manasseh. Even if we accept the view of Ewald or of Ball, we still desiderate evidence that this Heb original is the very prayer offered by the king in Babylon. But the arguments for a Gr original are fairly conclusive. Many OT scholars regard the narrative of the captivity, prayer and penitence of Manasseh as a fiction of the Chronicler's imagination, to whom it seemed highly improper that this wicked king should escape the punishment (exile) which he richly deserved. So De Wette (Einleitung), Graf (Stud. u. Krit., 1859, 467-94, and Gesch. Bücher des AT, 174) and Nöldeke (Schenkel's Bibelwerk, "Manasse"). Nothing corresponding to it occurs in the more literal narrative of 2 K 21, an argument which, however, has but little weight. Recent discoveries of cuneiform inscriptions have taken off the edge of the most important objections to the historicity of this part of Ch. See Ball (op. cit., 361 ff) and Bissell (Lange's Apoc, 468). The likeliest supposition is that the author of the Prayer was an Alexandrian Jew who, with 2 Ch 33 before him, desired to compose such a prayer as Manasseh was likely to offer under the supposed circumstances. This prayer, written in excellent Alexandrian Gr, is, as Fritzsche points out, an addition to 2 Ch 33, corresponding to the prayers of Mordecai and Esther added to the canonical Est (Ad Est 13 8-14 19), and also to the prayer of Azarias (Three 1 2-22) and the Song of the Three Young Men (Three 1 29-68) appended to the canonical Book of Dnl.

That the author was an Alexandrian Jew is made probable by the (Gr) language he employs and by the sentiments he expresses. It is 6. The Author and His Motive strange to find Swete (Expos T, II, 38 f) defending the Christian authorship of this Prayer. What purpose could the writer seek to realize in the composition and publication of the penitential psalm? In the absence of definite knowledge, one may with Reuss (Das AT, VI, 436 f) suppose that the Jewish nation was at the time given up to great unfaithfulness to God and to gross moral corruption. The lesson of the Prayer is that God will accept the penitent, whatever his sins, and remove from the nation its load of sufferings, if only it turns to God.

Ewald and Fürst (op. cit.) hold that the prayer is at least as old as the Book of Ch (300 BC), since it is distinctly mentioned, they say, in

7. Date 2 Ch 33 13.18 f. But the original form was, as seen (cf 4 above), Gr, not Heb.

Moreover, the teaching of the Prayer is post-Bib. The patriarchs are idealized to the extent that they are thought perfect and therefore not needing forgiveness (ver 8); their merits avail for the sinful and undeserving (ver 1) (see Weber, Jüd. Theologie, 292). The expressions "God of the Just" (ver 8), "God of those who repent" (ver 13), belong to comparatively late Judaism. A period about the beginning of the Christian era or (Fritzsche) slightly earlier would suit the character (language and teaching) of the Prayer. The similarity between the doctrines implied in Pr Man and those taught in apocryphal writings of the time confirms this conclusion. There is no need with Bertholdt to bring down the writing to the 2d or 3d cent. AD. Fabricius (Liber Tobit, etc, 208) dates the Prayer in the 4th or 5th cent. AD, because, in his opinion, its author is the same as that of the Apos Const which has that date. But the source of this part of the Apos Const is the Didaskalia (3d cent.), and moreover both these treatises are of Christian origin, the Prayer being the work of an Alexandrian Jew.

(1) The Greek text occurs in Codd. A, T (Psalterium Turicense 262, Parsons). Swete (OT in Gr, III, 802-4) gives the text of A with of the LXX, as also from several modern editions (Tischendorf, etc). Nestle (Septuaginta Studien, 1899, 3) holds that the Gr text of Codd. A, T, etc, has been taken from the Apos Const or from the Didaskalia. The common view is that it was extracted by the latter from the LXX.

(2) The Latin text in Sabatier (Bib. Sac. Lat, III, 1038) is not by Jerome, nor is it in the manner of the Old Lat; its date is later.

LITERATURE.—The outstanding literature has been cited in the foregoing art. Reference may be made to Howarth ("Some Unconventional Views on the Text of the Bible," PSBA, XXXI, 89 ff: he argues that the narrative concerning Manasseh, including the Prayer in the Apos Const, represents a portion of the true LXX of 2 Ch 33).

T. WITTON DAVIES

MANASSITES, ma-nas'tits (מַנַּשִּׁי, m'nashshî; מַנַּשִּׁי, ho Manassê): Members of the tribe of Manasseh (Dt 4 43; Jgs 12 4 AV; 2 K 10 33).

MAN-CHILD, man'child (ARV; "man child," ERV; not in AV; מַשְׁתֵּן בְּכִיר, mashtên b'kir): The expression is used with the meaning of "male," but is found only in the description of the extermination of a whole family, where it is employed to express every male descendant of any age. It occurs in 1 S 25 22.34; 1 K 14 10; 16 11; 21 21; 2 K 9 8.

MANDRAKES, man'drāks (מַדְרָאִים, dūdḥā'im; μανδραγόρας, mandragóras [Gen 30 14 f; Cant 7 13]; the marginal reading "love apples" is due to the supposed connection of dūdḥā'im with מְדֻחִים, dōdḥim, "love"): Mandrakes are the fruit of the Mandragora officinarum, a member of the Solanaceae or potato order, closely allied to the Atropa bella-

donna. It is a common plant all over Pal, flourishing particularly in the spring and ripening about the time of the wheat harvest (Gen 30 14). The plant has a rosette of handsome dark leaves, dark purple flowers and orange, tomato-like fruit. The root is long and branched; to pull it up is still considered unlucky (cf Jos, BJ, VII, vi, 3). The fruit is called in Arab. baīḍ el-jinn, the "eggs of the jinn"; they have a narcotic smell and sweetish taste, but are too poisonous to be used as food. They are still used in folklore medicine in Pal. The plant was well known as an aphrodisiac by the ancients (Cant 7 13). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MANEH, man'e, or MINA, mī'na (מָנָה, māneh; μνά, mná, "pound" [EV]): A weight containing 50 shekels, according to Heb usage, but which varied according to the standard adopted. Estimated on the Phoen, or commercial, standard, it was equal to 11,200 grains, or about 2 lbs. troy, or about 1.6 lbs. avoirdupois. This is probably the weight intended in 1 K 10 17; Ezr 2 69 and Neh 7 71 f (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). When used in a monetary sense, the māneh of silver was worth about £6 17s. or $34; the gold māneh was equal to about £102 10s. or $510. H. PORTER

MANES, mā'nēz (Μάνης, Mānēs): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 21). It represents the two names Maaseiah and Elijah of the || Ezr 10 21. The real equivalent is probably Maaseiah, Elijah being dropped. RVm and AVm give Harim of Ezr 10 21 as identical—apparently incorrectly, for the words "and of the sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 21) are simply omitted. AV blunders strangely here in reading Eanes after a misprint Ḥánēs, Ēánēs (for Mánēs, Mānēs) in the Aldine edition.

MANGER, mán'jēr (φάτνη, phátñē): Properly the place in a stall or stable where the food of cattle is placed (in the OT "crib" [Job 39 9; Prov 14 4; Isa 1 3]); thus also, apparently, in the narrative of the nativity in Lk 2 7.12.16. In LXX, the Gr word, representing different Heb words, has also the extended meaning of "stall" (2 Ch 32 28; Hab 3 17); thus also in Lk 13 15, where RVm has "manger." Old tradition says that Jesus was born in a cave in the neighborhood of Bethlehem; even so, a place for food for cattle may have been cut in the side of the rock. JAMES ORR

MANI, mā'nī (Μανί, Maní): Head of a family (1 Esd 9 30) = "Bani" in Ezr 10 29, the form which appears in 1 Esd 5 12.

MANIFEST, man'i-fest, MANIFESTATION, man-i-fes-tā'shun (φανερῶς, phanerōō, φανερός, phanerós): "To manifest" is generally the tr of phanerōō, "to make apparent" (Mk 4 22; Jn 17 6; Rom 3 21; 1 Tim 3 16, "God was manifest in the flesh," RV "manifested"; 1 Jn 1 2 bis, etc); also of phaneros, "manifest" (Acts 4 16; Rom 1 19; 1 Cor 3 13; 1 Jn 3 10, etc); "to make manifest" (phanerōō) (Jn 1 31; Rom 16 26); of emphanizō, "to make fully manifest" (Jn 14 21 f); of emphanēs, "fully manifest" (Rom 10 20); of dēlos, "evident," trd "manifest" (1 Cor 15 27, RV "evident"); of ekdēlos, "very evident" (2 Tim 3 9, RV "evident"); of prōdēlos, "evident beforehand" (1 Tim 5 25, RV "evident"); of aphanēs, is "not manifest" (He 4 13, "There is no creature that is not manifest in his sight"); "manifest," occurs once in the OT as the tr of bārār, "to clear," "to purify" (Eccl 3 18, RV "prove"); of phanerōs (2 Macc 3 28, RV "manifestly").

Manifestation is the tr of apokálupsis, "uncovering" (Rom 8 19, "the manifestation of the sons of God," RV "revealing"); of phanērōsis, "manifestation" (1 Cor 12 7; 2 Cor 4 2).

RV has "manifest" for "shew" (Jn 7 4); "was manifested" for "appeared" (Mk 16 12.14); "was manifested to the," for "shewed himself to his" (Jn 21 14); "be made manifest" for "appear" (2 Cor 5 10; 7 12; Rev 3 18); "became manifest" for "was made known" (Acts 7 13); "gave him to be made manifest" for "shewed him openly" (Acts 10 40); "He who was manifested" for "God was manifest" (1 Tim 3 16) (m "The word God, in place of He who, rests on no sufficient ancient evidence. Some ancient authorities read which"), "is not yet made manifest" for "doth not yet appear" (1 Jn 3 2); "by the manifestation" for "with the brightness" (2 Thess 2 8); "be manifested" for "appear" (Col 3 4 bis; 1 Pet 5 4); "if he shall be manifested" for "when he shall appear" (1 Jn 2 28; 3 2), etc.

MANIFESTLY, man'i-fest-li (μαρῶς, mar'eh, "[in] personal presence"): Has the meaning of "by direct vision," as in 1 Cor 13 12, "face to face," stating positively (Nu 12 8) what the next clause states negatively, viz. "not in dark speeches." "Apparently" of AV is ambiguous.

MANIFOLD, man'i-föld (רַב, rabh; ποικίλος, poikilos): "Manifold," which occurs only a few times, is in the OT the tr of rabh, "many," "abundant" (Neh 9 19.27; Am 5 12, where it is equivalent to "many"), and of rābhah, "to multiply," "to increase" (Ps 104 24, "O Jeh, how manifold are thy works"); poikilos, properly, "many colored," "spotted," "variegated," is trd "manifold": 1 Pet 1 6 m, "manifold temptations"; 4 10, "manifold grace," suggests variety, diverseness; polupoikilos has this meaning more intensely (Eph 3 10, "the manifold wisdom of God"). With this may be compared a fine passage in Wisd 7 22, where it is said that in Wisdom there is "an understanding spirit, holy, one only [RV "alone in kind," m "Gr sole-born"], manifold [polumerēs]." In like manner, pollaplastōn, "manifold more" (Lk 18 30), indicates the varied elements of the reward of him who is faithful to Christ. In Eccles 51 3, we have "manifold afflictions" (pleōn). W. L. WALKER

MANIUS, mā'ni-us, TITUS, tī'tus (Τίτος Μάνιος, Τίτος Μάνιος, A, V and Syr; Μάνλιος, Μάνλιος, Swete following A; Manilius, Itala and Vulg, AV Manlius): Titus Manius and Quintus Memmius were the legates of the Romans who carried a letter unto the Jewish people consenting to the favorable terms which Lysias, the captain of Antiochus, granted to the Jews after his defeat, 163 BC (2 Macc 11 34). That the letter is spurious appears from the facts (1) that it is dated in the 148th year of the Seleucidian era adopted by the Jews and not, after the Rom fashion, according to consulates; (2) that it is also dated the same day as that of Eupator—the 15th of the month Xanthicus; (3) that the Jews had as yet no dealings with the Romans; Judas first heard of the fame of the Romans a year or two years later (1 Macc 8 1 ff), after the death of Nicanor (7 47); (4) that no such names are found among the Rom legati mentioned by Polybius as sent to the East. If Manius is not altogether a fabrication, it is difficult to decide exactly who he is. The reading fluctuates between "Manius" and "Manlius." About the same time a T. Manlius Torquatus was sent by the Romans on an embassy to Egypt to settle a quarrel between Philometer and Euergetes II Physcon (Polyb. xxxi.18; Livy xliii.11), but not to Syria, and his colleague was Cn. Merula. Perhaps Manius Sergius is intended, who with C. Sulpicius was sent to investigate the state of Greece and to see what Antiochus Epiphanes and Eumenes were doing (165 BC) (Polyb. xxxi.9). But no such name as Titus Manius or Manlius is otherwise found as legate to Asia with a colleague Quintus Memmius. See also MEMMIUS. S. ANGUS

MANKIND, man-kind': In Lev 18 22; 20 13, the term is applied to men, as distinguished from women; in Job 12 10, to the human race; in Jas 3 7, to the human nature.

MANLIUS, man'li-us, TITUS. See MANIUS, TITUS.

MANNA, man'a (מָן, mān; μάννα, mánna): The Heb mān is probably derived, as Ebers suggests, from the Egyp mennu, "food." In Ex 16 15, we have a suggested source of the name, "They said one to another, What is it?" i.e. manhu, which also means, "It is manna" (see m).

This substance is described as occurring in flakes or small round grains, lit. "hoar frost"; it fell with the dew (Nu 11 9) and appeared when the dew left the ground (Ex 16 14); "It

1. OT References was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey" (ver 31). In Nu 11 8, its taste is described "as the taste of fresh oil," m "cakes baked with oil." "And the children of Israel did eat the manna forty years, until they came . . . unto the borders of the land of Canaan" (Ex 16 35). It ceased the day after they ate the produce of the land, unleavened cakes and parched grain, in the plains of Jericho (Josh 5 10-12). Although an important article of diet, it was by no means the sole one as seems implied in Nu 21 5; there are plenty of references (e.g. Ex 17 3; 24 5; 34 3; Lev 8 2.26.31; 9 4; 10 12; 24 5; Nu 7 13.19 f, etc) which show that they had other food besides. The food was gathered every morning, "every man according to his eating: and when the sun waxed hot, it melted" (Ex 16 21); a portion of the previous day's gathering bred worms and stank if kept (ver 20); on the 6th day a double amount was gathered, the Sabbath portion being miraculously preserved (vs 22-27). A pot—a golden one (He 9 4)—with an omer of manna was "laid up before Jeh" in the tabernacle (Ex 16 33). Manna is referred to in Neh 9 20. It is described poetically as "food from heaven" and "bread of the mighty" (Ps 78 24 f); as "bread of heaven" (Ps 105 40); and as "angels' bread" (2 Esd 1 19; Wisd 16 20).

In Jn 6 31-63, Our Lord frequently refers to "the manna" or "bread from heaven" as typical of Himself. St. Paul (1 Cor 10 3)

2. NT refers to it as "spiritual food," and in References Rev 2 17 we read, "To him that overcometh, to him will I give of the hidden manna."

Manna, as might be expected, figures largely in rabbinical lit. It was, it is said, adapted to the taste of each individual who could by wishing taste in the manna anything he desired (cf Wisd 16 21). Manna is reserved as the future food of the righteous (cf Rev 2 17), for which purpose it is ground in a mill situated in the third heaven (Hag 12b; Tan. Beshallah 22).

No substance is known which in any degree satisfies all the requirements of the Scriptural references, but several travelers in the wilderness have

3. Natural Explanations reported phenomena which suggest some of the features of the miraculous manna.

(1) In the Peninsula of Sinai, on the route of the children of Israel, a species of tamarisk, named in consequence by Ebers Tammaris mannifera, is found to exude a sweet, honey-like substance where its bark is pierced by an insect, Gossyparia mannifera. It collects upon the twigs and falls to the ground. The Arabs who gather it to sell to pilgrims call it mann-es-samā, "heavenly manna"; it is white at first but turns yellow; in the early morning it is of the consistency of wax but when the sun is hot it disappears. This substance occurs only after mid-summer and for a month or two at most.

(2) A second proposal is to identify manna with a lichen—Lecanora esculenta and allied species—which grows in the Arabian and other deserts upon the limestone. The older masses become detached and are rolled about by the wind. When swept together by sudden rain storms in the rainy season they may collect in large heaps. This lichen has been used by the Arabs in time of need for making bread. It is a quite reasonable form of nourishment in the desert, esp. when eaten with the sugary manna from the trees.

MANNER, man'ēr, MANNERS, man'ēr (דָּבָר, dābhār, דֶּרֶךְ, derekh, מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt; ἔθος, ēthos, οὗτος, houtō): "Manner" (probably

1. As Used from manus, "the hand," mode of in the OT handling things, or acting) is in the Bible in general equivalent (1) to way, custom, habit, etc, (2) to kind or sort. There are some special senses, however, and archaic usages. It is frequently the tr of dābhār, "speaking," "word," "thing" (Gen 18 25, "That be far from thee to do after this manner" [i.e. in this way]; 32 19, "On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau" [in this way]; 39 19, "After this manner [in this way] did thy servant to me"; Ex 22 9, "every manner of trespass" [every kind, sort, or way]; Dt 15 2; 1 S 17 27.30 bis); also of derekh, "way" (Gen 19 31, "after the manner of all the earth" [way]; 1 S 21 5 AV "[the bread] is in a manner common"; "manner" here might be taken as equivalent to "way" or "measure," but the passage is a difficult one and the text uncertain; RV omits "manner," and in the text makes the reference to be to the journey, not to the bread, but in m it has "common [bread]"; Isa 10 24.26, "after the manner of Egypt" [after the way or fate of Egypt]; so also Am 4 10; 8 14, "the manner of Beer-sheba liveth," RV "the way," m "manner," the reference here being to the religious way, or manner of worship); of mishpāt, "judgment," "ordinance," hence also "manner" or "custom" (Gen 40 13; Ex 21 9; 2 K 1 7, "what manner of man" [sort or kind]; 17 26 AV; 1 Ch 24 19; Ezk 11 12, "after the manners [RV "ordinances"] of the nations"); lōrāh, "instruction," "law," is also tr<sup>d</sup> "manner" (2 S 7 19, "[is] this the manner [m "law"] of man, O Lord God?"; RV "and this [too] after the manner of men, O Lord Jeh," m "and is this the law of man, O Lord Jeh?"). Other words are: 'ōrah, "path," "custom" (Gen 18 11); dōbher, "leading," "pasture" (cf "sheep-walk," "sheep-fold"); Isa 5 17, "Then shall the lambs feed after their manner," RV "as in their pasture" (in Mic 2 12, the same word is tr<sup>d</sup> AV "fold," RV "pasture"); d'mūth, "likeness" (Ezk 23 15); dāth, "law," "sentence" (Est 2 12); hukkāh, "statute," "custom" (Lev 20 23) in AV. In Nu 5 13 "with the manner" is supplied to "taken" (in adultery). "Manner" here is an old law-French phrase, "a thief taken with the mainour"—that is, with the thing stolen upon him in manu (in his hand) (Blackstone, Comm., IV, xxiii), RV "in the act" (cf Jn 8 4, "in the very act"); gam, "also" is tr<sup>d</sup> (1 S 19 24) "in like manner," RV "also."

In Apoc, 2 Macc 4 13 AV, we have "increase of heathenish manners," RV "an extreme of Gr fashions," 6 9, the "manners of the 2. As Used Gentiles," RV "the Gr rites"; in 2 in the Apoc-Esd 9 19, AV and RV, "manners" rypha appears in the sense of "morals"; cf 1 Cor 15 33, RV "Evil companionships corrupt good morals."

In the NT various words and phrases are rendered by "manner"; we have ethos, "custom," "usage," "manner" (Jn 19 40; Acts 15 1, 3. As Used RV "custom"); kalá tō eiōthós (Lk 4 In the NT 16, RV "as his custom was"); trópos, a "turning," "manner," "way" (Jude ver 7); hón trópon, "in which manner" (Acts 1 11); houlós, "thus," "so," "accordingly," is "after this manner," "in like manner" (Mt 6 9; Mk 13 29 AV); in Acts 15 23, "after this manner" stands in AV for "by their hands," RV "thus"; pōs (Acts 20 18), "after what manner"; agōgē, "course of life" (2 Tim 3 10, RV "conduct"); biōsis, "mode of life" (Acts 26 4); in 1 Cor 15 33, we have manners in the moral sense, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," ARV "Evil companionships corrupt good morals." Acts 13 18 is interesting because of diversities of rendering: AV has "suffered he their manners in the wilderness," m "etropophōrēsen, perhaps for etropophōrēsen, bore, or fed them as a nurse beareth or feedeth her child, Dt 1 31 (2 Macc 7 27) according to LXX, and so Chrysostom"; ERV text, same as AV, m "Many ancient authorities read 'bear he them as a nursing father in the wilderness.' See Dt 1 31"; ARV (text) "as a nursing-father bare he them in the wilderness," m "Many ancient authorities read 'Suffered he their manners in the wilderness.' See Dt 9 7." The Gr words differ only by a single letter, and authorities are pretty equally divided.

Among other changes RV has frequently "ordinance" for "manner" (Lev 5 10, etc.) and "custom" (Ruth 4 7; Jn 19 40; He 10 25, etc.); "manner of" is introduced (1 S 4 8, etc.); "manner or" and "manner" omitted (Gen 25 23; Ex 35 29, etc.); "what manner of house" for "where is the house" (Isa 66 1); "manner of life" for "conversation" (Gal 1 13; Eph 4 22); "after the manner of men" for "as a man" (Rom 3 5; 1 Cor 9 8); "how to inquire concerning these things" (Acts 25 20) for "of such manner of questions," "in an unworthy manner," ARV, for "unworthily" (1 Cor 11 27); "who" for "what manner of man" (Mk 4 41; Lk 8 25, "who then is this?"; in Lk 9 55, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of" is omitted, with the m "Some ancient authorities add and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of."

MANOAH, ma-nō'a (מָנוֹחַ, mānōah, "rest"): A man of Zorah and of the family of the Danites. M. was the father of Samson, and his life-story is but imperfectly told in the history of the conception, birth and early life of his son. No children had been born to M. and his wife, and the latter was considered barren (Jgs 13 2). Finally it was revealed to her by an angel of the Lord that she would conceive and bear a child. She was cautioned against strong drink and "unclean" food, for her child was to be born and reared a Nazirite to the end that he might save Israel out of the hands of the Philis (13 3-5). That M. was a devout man seems certain in view of the fact that, upon hearing of the angel's visit, he offered a prayer for the angel's return, in order that he and his wife might be instructed as to the proper care of the child to be born (13 8). The request was granted and the angel repeated the visit and the instructions (13 9-13). M. with true hospitality would have the guest remain and partake of food. The angel refused, but commanded a sacrifice unto Jeh. When M. had prepared the sacrifice and lit it on the altar, the angel ascended in the flame from the altar and appeared no more (13 15-21). The child was born according to the promise and was named Samson. M. and his wife appear twice in the narrative of Samson's early life—once as they protestingly accompanied him to sue for the hand of a Philis woman of Timnah in marriage, and again when they went with him to Timnah for the wedding.

Jos richly embellishes this Scriptural narrative concerning M., but offers no further light upon the occupation or character of M. At the death of Samson, his brothers went down to Gaza and brought back the body and buried it by the side of M. in the family tomb near Zorah (16 31). In Samson Agonistes Milton gains dramatic effect by having M. survive Samson and in deep sorrow assist at his burial.

MANSERVANT, man'sūr-vant (מַעֲבָד, 'ebhedh): A male slave; usually coupled with maidservant or female slave (Gen 12 16; Ex 20 10; 1 S 8 16; Job 31 13; Lk 12 45). See SERVANT; SLAVE.

MANSION, man'shun (μονή, monē, "abode"): In Jn 14 2, the word is used in the pl.: "In my Father's house are many mansions," RVm "abiding places." The ideas conveyed are those of abundance of room, and permanence of habitation, in the heavenly world.

MANSLAYER, man'slā-ēr (רָצָח, m'raççāh, from רָצַח, rāçah [Nu 35 6.12]; ἀνδροφόνος, androphónos [1 Tim 1 9]): A term employed with reference to both premeditated and accidental or justifiable killing. In the latter case, an asylum was granted (Nu 35 6.12) until the death of the high priest, after which the slayer was allowed to "return into the land of his possession" (ver 28). The cases in which the manslayer was to be held clearly immune from the punishment imposed on wilful killing were: (1) death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Nu 35 22); (2) death by anything thrown at random (Nu 35 22.23); (3) death by the blade of an axe flying from the handle (Dt 19 5). Among the cases in which one would be held responsible for the death of another, is to be counted the neglectful act of building a house without a parapet (Dt 22 8).

Manslaughter, as a modern legal term, is employed to distinguish unpremeditated killing from coldblooded murder, but formerly (2 Esd 1 26) it was used in a more general sense. See MURDER.

MANSTEALING, man'stēl-ing. See CRIME, under "Kidnapping"; PUNISHMENT.

MANTELET, man'tel-et, man't'l-et, mant'let (Nah 2 5). See SIEGE, 4, (d).

MANTLE, man't'l: Used 5 t of Elijah's mantle (מְאֲדֶרֶת, 'addereth, 1 K 19 18.19; 2 K 2 8.13.14), which was probably of hair. Found in pl. once (Isa 3 22), where it (ma'atāphōth) is an upper wide tunic with sleeves (k'thōneth). See DRESS; KERCHIEF.

MANUSCRIPTS, man'ū-skripts: In the broadest sense manuscripts include all handwritten records as distinguished from printed records. In a narrower sense they are handwritten codices, rolls and folded documents, as distinguished from printed books on the one hand and inscriptions, or engraved documents, on the other. More loosely, but commonly, the term is used as synonym of the codex.

The Heb and Gr manuscripts of the OT and NT, respectively, form the primary sources for establishing the text or true original words of the respective authors. The subordinate sources, VSS and quotations have also their text problem, and manuscripts of the VSS and of the church Fathers, and other ancient writers who refer to Bib. matters, play the same part in establishing the true words of the VS or the writer that the Heb and Gr manuscripts play in establishing the original of Scripture. For discussion of the textual aspects, see arts. on TEXT AND MSS OF THE NT, TEXT OF THE OT, on VERSIONS, and esp. the SEPTUAGINT. For the material, writing instruments, form of manuscripts, etc, see BOOK; and esp. the lit. under WRITING.

MANUSCRIPTS OF THE NT. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS OF THE NT.

MAOCH, mā'ok (מֵעֹק, mā'ōkh, "oppressed," "bruised"): The same as Maacah (1 K 2 39). The father of that Achish, king of Gath, with whom David and his 600 sojourned under fear of Saul's treachery (1 S 27 2).

MAON, mā'on, MAONITES, mā'on-its, māt-ō'nits (מֵעֹן, mā'ōn; B, Μαώ, Maōr, Maāv, Maān, A, Μαών, Maōn):

(1) A town in the mountain of Judah named along with Carmel and Ziph (Josh 15 55). It appears again as the home of Nabal, the great flockmaster (1 S 25 2). In the genealogical list of 1 Ch 2, Maon stands as the "son" of Shammai and the "father" of Beth-zur (vs 44.45). This evidently means that Shammai was the founder of Maon. About a mile S. of el-Karmil, the ancient Carmel, lies Tell Ma'in. This may be confidently identified with Maon, the radicals of the names being the same. It suits the requirements of the narratives in other respects, being near to Carmel, while the surrounding wilderness is still used as the wide pasture land for multitudinous flocks. In this district, the wilderness of Maon, David was hiding when his whereabouts was betrayed to Saul by the men of Ziph (1 S 23 24 f), and only a timely raid by the Philis delivered him out of that monarch's hands (vs 27 ff).

(2) (Μαδιάμ, Madiām): Maon is named along with the Zidonians and Amalek as having at some time, not mentioned, oppressed Israel (Jgs 10 12). The LXX "Midian" has been accepted by some scholars as restoring the original text, since, otherwise, the Midianites remain unmentioned. But the Maonites are evidently identical with the Meunim of 1 Ch 4 41 (RV), the pastoral people destroyed by Hezekiah. In 2 Ch 20 1 AV, instead of "other beside the Ammonites" we must read "some of the Meunim," as associated with the Ammonites in the battle with Jehoshaphat. Against them also Uzziah was helped of God (2 Ch 26 7). They are included among the inhabitants of Mt. Seir (20 10.23), so that an Edomite tribe is intended. It is natural to connect them with Ma'an, a place on the great pilgrim road, and now a station on the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, to the S.E. of Petra. It undoubtedly represents an ancient stronghold.

The Maonites appear in the lists of those who returned from exile (Ezr 2 50, AV "Mehunim," RV "Meunim"; Neh 7 52, "Meunim"). These may possibly be the descendants of prisoners taken in the wars of Jehoshaphat and Uzziah, to whom menial tasks may have been appointed in the temple services.

W. EWING

MAR, mār: "To mar" means "to destroy," "to disfigure," "to damage." Job 30 13, "They mar my path" (RVm "they break up"); Nah 2 2, "and destroyed their vine" (AV "and marred their vine"); cf Lev 19 27; 2 K 3 19; Isa 52 14; Jer 13 9.

MARA, mā'ra, mār'a (מָרָה, mārāh, "bitter"): The term which Naomi applies to herself on her return from Moab to her native country (Ruth 1 20). Changed beyond recognition, she creates astonishment among her former acquaintances, who ask, "Is this Naomi?" She replies, "Call me not Naomi" (i.e. "pleasant" or "sweet"), but "call me Mara" (i.e. "bitter"). In the light of her bitter experience, and her present pitiable plight, the old name has become peculiarly inappropriate.

MARAH, mā'ra, mār'a (מָרָה, mārāh, "bitter"): The first camp of the Israelites after the passage of the Red Sea (Ex 15 23; Nu 33 8 f). The name is derived from the bitterness of the brackish water. Moses cast a tree into the waters which were thus made sweet (Ex 15 23). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MARALAH, mar'a-lā (מַרְאֵלָה, mar'ālāh; B, Μαράλδα, Marageldā, A, Μαράλα, Marilā): A place on the western border of Zebulun (Josh 19 11). Pesh renders Rāmāth ta'le, "height of the fox." It is not identified.

MARANATHA, mar-a-nath'a, mar-an-ā'tha (from Aram. words, מֵרָנָה מְרָנָה, mārānā' āthāh, "Our Lord cometh, or will come"; according to some, "has come"; to others, "Come!" an invitation for his speedy reappearance [cf Rev 22 20]; μαράναθά, maranathā, or μαράναθά, marān althā): Used in connection with ἀνάθεμα, anathema, "accursed" (1 Cor 16 22), but has no necessary connection therewith. It was used by early Christians to add solemn emphasis to previous statement, injunction or adjuration, and seems to have become a sort of watchword; possibly forming part of an early liturgy.

MARBLE, mār'b'l (שֵׁשׁ, shayish, שֹׁהַשׁ, shēsh, אֲבָנֵי שֵׁשׁ, 'abhne shayish, "stones of marble" [1 Ch 29 2]; נֶפֶשׁ בָּהֶט נֶשֶׁשׁ נֶרֶךְ, riḥpath bahat wā-shēsh w-dhar w-sōhāreth, "a pavement of red, and white, and yellow, and black marble," or, according to m, "a pavement of porphyry, and white marble, and alabaster, and stone of blue color" [Est 1 6]; אֲמֻדֵּי שֵׁשׁ, 'ammūdhe shēsh, "pillars of marble" [Est 1 6; Cant 5 15]; cf שֶׁשׁ, shēsh, AVm "silk" or RV "fine linen" [Gen 41 42; Ex 25 4, etc]; שֹׁשְׁאֲנִים, shōshannīm, "lilies" [Cant 2 16, etc], apparently from a root signifying "white"; μάμαρος, māmaros, "marble" [Rev 18 12]: Marble is properly crystalline limestone, usually pure white or veined with black, the former being in demand for statuary, while the latter is used in architecture, esp. for floors and pillars. True marble is not found in Pal, but is obtained from Greece or Italy. Much of the stone described as marble is non-crystalline limestone capable of being smoothed and polished. White or yellow stone of this character is abundant in Pal. Non-crystalline rocks of other colors are also sometimes called marble. In the passage from Est cited above (cf m), it is a question whether the reference is to marble and other stones or to marble of different colors. In 1 Ch 29 2, "marble stones" are mentioned among the materials brought together by David for the building of the temple. In Est 1 6, pillars and a pavement of marble are features of the palace of Ahasuerus. In Cant 5 15, the various parts of the body of the "beloved" are likened to gold, beryl, ivory, sapphire, and marble. In Rev 18 12, marble occurs in the list of the merchandise of Babylon. All these references imply a costly stone, and therefore probably one imported from other countries, and make it likely that true crystalline marble is meant. ALFRED ELY DAY

MARCH, mārch, MARCHES, mārch'iz. See ARMY; WAR.

MARCION, mār'shun, GOSPEL OF. See APOC-RYPHAL GOSPELS.

MARCUS, mār'kus. See MARK, JOHN.

MARDOCHEUS, mār-dō-kē'us (Μαρδοχαίος, Mardochoaios):

(1) One of the Jewish leaders who accompanied Zerubbabel on the return from Babylon to Judah (1 Esd 5 8, where it stands for "Mordecai" of Ezr 2 2 and Neh 7 7).

(2) Another form of Mordecai, the uncle of Esther (Ad Est 10 4; 11 2.12; 12 1.4 ff; 16 13).

MARE, mār ([1] מָרָה, šūšāh, "steed," AV "company of horses"; LXX ἵππος, hē hippos, "mare" [Cant 1 9]; [2] בְּנֵי הָרָמְמָחַיִם, bnē hā-rammākhīm, "bred of the stud," AV and RVm "young dromedaries" [Est 8 10]; cf Arab. رَمَكَة, ramakat, "mare"): The word "mare" does not occur in EV, but in Cant 1 9 we find šūšāh, the fem. of šūš, "horse," and in Est 8 10, bnē hā-rammākhīm is by some trad "sons of mares." See CAMEL; HORSE.

MARESHAH, ma-rē'sha (מְרֶשָׁה, mārēšāh; B, Βαρθσαά, Bathēsār, A, Μαρησα, Marēsā): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Keilah and Achzib (Josh 15 44). It occupied such a position that Rehoboam thought well to fortify it for the protection of Jerus (2 Ch 11 8). In the valley of Zephathian and Mareshah, Asa overwhelmed Zerah the Ethiopian and his army, pursuing them as far as Gezer (2 Ch 14 9 ff). From M. came Eliezer the prophet who denounced disaster upon the commercial copartnership of Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah (20 37). The place is mentioned in Mic (1 15). M. was plundered and burned by Judas Maccaebaeus (Ant, XII, viii, 6; 1 Macc 5 66 RVm). Hithir Gorgias escaped, having been rescued from the hands of Dositheus by a Thracian horseman (2 Macc 12 35). It was taken by John Hyrcanus, who allowed the inhabitants to remain on condition that they adopt circumcision and submit to the Jewish law. This they did; and later John avenged an injustice done to M. by the Samaritans. It is then described as "a colony of Jews" (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; x, 2). The city was treated with favor by Pompey (XIV, iv, 4). When the Parthians invaded Judaea in support of Antigonus they demolished M. (xiii, 9).

According to Onom, M. was 2 Rom miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin). Until recently it was thought that Khirbet Mir'ash, where the old name lingers, not far S.W. of Beit Jibrin, represented the ancient city. The work of Dr. Bliss, however ("Excavations in Pal," PEF), shows that it must be located at Tell Sandahannah, about a mile S. of Beit Jibrin. A series of remarkable tombs was discovered here. From 1 Ch 2 42 we may perhaps gather that Hebron was colonized by the men of M.

MARIMOTH, mar'i-moth, mar'i-mōth: An ancestor of Esdras (Ezra) (2 Esd 1 2), identical with Meraioth (Ezr 7 3). In 1 Esd 8 2, it appears also as "Memeroth" (AV "Meremoth").

MARINER, mar'i-nēr. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3); III, 2.

MARISA, mar'i-sa (Μαρισα, Marisá): The Gr form of MARESHAH (q.v.) in 2 Macc 12 35.

MARISH, mar'ish (מַרִּישׁ, gebhe'; ἑλος, hēlos): An old form of "marsh," found in AV, ERV Ezk 47 11 (ARV "marsh"). Some (not all) edd of the AV Apoc have retained this same spelling in 1 Macc 9 42.45 (RV "marsh").

MARK, mārk: In the AV this word is used 22 t as a noun and 26 t as a predicate. In the former case it is represented by 5 Heb and 3 Gr words; in the latter by 11 Heb and 2 Gr words. As a noun it is purely a physical term, gaining almost a technical significance from the "mark" put upon Cain (Gen 4 15 AV); the stigmata of Christ in Paul's body (Gal 6 17); the "mark of the beast" (Rev 16 2).

As a vb. it is almost exclusively a mental process: e.g. "to be attentive," "understand": בִּינְךָ, bīn (Job 18 2 AV), rightly rendered in RV "consider"; שִׁית, shith, "Mark ye well her bulwarks" (Ps 48 13), i.e. turn the mind to, notice, regard; שָׁמַר, shamar, i.e. observe, keep in view; so Ps 37 37, "Mark the perfect man"; cf Job 22 15 AV. This becomes a unique expression in 1 S 1 12, where Eli, noticing the movement of Hannah's lips in prayer, is said to have "marked her mouth." Jesus "marked" how invited guests chose out (ἐπεχῶ, epēchō, i.e. "observed") the chief seats (Lk 14 7); so σκοπέω, skopēō (Rom 16 17; Phil 3 17), "Mark them," i.e. look at, signifying keen mental attention, i.e. scrutinize, observe carefully. The only exceptions to this mental signification of the vb. are two vs in the OT: Isa 44 13, "He marketh it out with a pencil" ("red ochre," AV "line"), and "with the compasses," where the vb. is מָלַךְ, tal'ar, "to delineate," "mark out"; Jer 2 22, "Thine iniquity is marked (קָרָם, kātham, "cut (i.e. engraved)] before me," signifying the deep and ineradicable nature of sin. It may also be rendered "written," as in indelible hieroglyphics.

As a noun the term "mark" may signify, according to its various Heb and Gr originals, a sign, "a target" an object of assault, a brand or stigma cut or burnt in the flesh, a goal or end in view, a stamp or imprinted or engraved sign.

(1) מַרְוֶה, 'ōth, "a sign": Gen 4 15 AV, "The Lord set a mark upon Cain" (ARV "appointed a sign"). It is impossible to tell the nature of this sign.

Delitzsch thinks that the rabbins were mistaken in regarding it as a mark upon Cain's body. He considers it rather "a certain sign which protected him from vengeance," the continuance of his life being necessary for the preservation of the race. It was thus, as the Heb indicates, the token of a covenant which God made with Cain that his life would be spared.

(2) מַטָּר, maṭṭārā, "an aim," hence a mark to shoot at. Jonathan arranged to shoot arrows as at a mark, for a sign to David (1 S 20 20); Job felt himself to be a target for the Divine arrows, i.e. for the Divinely decreed sufferings which wounded him and which he was called to endure (Job 16 12); so Jeremiah, "He hath set me as a mark for the arrow" (Lam 3 12); closely akin to this is מִפְּגָא, mīphgā, an object of attack (Job 7 20), where Job in bitterness of soul feels that God has become his enemy, and says, "Why hast thou made me the mark of hostile attack?"; "set me as a mark for thee." See TARGET.

(3) תָּ, taw, "mark" (Ezk 9 4.6). In Ezekiel's vision of the destruction of the wicked, the mark to be set upon the forehead of the righteous, at Jeh's command, was, as in the case of the blood sprinkled on the door-posts of the Israelites (Ex 12 22.23), for their protection. As the servants of God (Rev 7 2.3)—the elect—were kept from harm by being sealed with the seal of the living God in their foreheads, so the man clothed in linen, with a writer's inkhorn by his side, was told to mark upon their foreheads those whom God would save from judgment by His sheltering grace. Taw also appears (Job 31 35) for the attesting mark made to a document (RV "signature," m "mark").

The letter ת in the Phoen alphabet and on the coins of the Maccabees had the form of a cross (T). In oriental synods it was used as a signature by bishops who could not write. The cross, as a sign of ownership, was burnt upon the necks or thighs of horses and camels. It may have been the "mark" set upon the forehead of the righteous in Ezekiel's vision.

(4) שְׂרָפָה, ka'ākā, "a stigma" cut or burnt. The Israelites were forbidden (Lev 19 28) to follow the custom of other oriental and heathen nations in cutting, disfiguring or branding their bodies.

The specific prohibition "not to print any marks upon" themselves evidently has reference to the custom of tattooing common among savage tribes, and in vogue among both men and women of the lower orders in Arabia, Egypt, and many other lands. It was intended to cultivate reverence for and a sense of the sacredness of the human body, as God's creation, known in the Christian era as the temple of the Holy Spirit. See also CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.

(5) σκοπός, skopós, something seen or observed in the distance, hence a "goal." The Christian life seemed to St. Paul, in the intensity of his spiritual ardor, like the stadium or race-course of the Greeks, with runners stretching every nerve to reach the goal and win the prize. "I press on toward the goal [AV "mark"] unto the prize" (Phil 3 14). The mark or goal is the ideal of life revealed in Christ, the prize, the attainment and possession of that life.

In Wisd 5 21 "they fly to the mark" is from εὐστοχοί, eústochoi, "with true aim" (so RV).

(6) στίγμα, stigma, "a mark pricked or branded upon the body." Slaves and soldiers, in ancient times, were stamped or branded with the name of their master. Paul considered and called himself the bondsman of Jesus Christ. The traces of his sufferings, scourging, stonings, persecution, wounds, were visible in permanent scars on his body (cf 2 Cor 11 23-27). These he termed the stigmata of Jesus, marks branded in his very flesh as proofs of his devotion to his Master (Gal 6 17).

This passage gives no ground for the Romanist superstition that the very scars of Christ's crucifixion were reproduced in Paul's hands and feet and side. It is also "alien to the lofty self-consciousness" of these words to find in them, as some expositors do, a contrast in Paul's thought to the scar of circumcision.

(7) χάραγμα, cháragma, "a stamp" or "imprinted mark." "The mark of the beast" (peculiar to Rev) was the badge of the followers of Antichrist, stamped on the forehead or right hand (Rev 13 16; cf Ezk 9 4.6). It was symbolic of character and was thus not a literal or physical mark, but the impress of paganism on the moral and spiritual life. It was the sign or token of apostasy. As a spiritual state or condition it subjected men to the wrath of God and to eternal torment (Rev 14 9-11); to noisome disease (16 2); to the lake of fire (19 20). Those who received not the mark, having faithfully endured persecution and martyrdom, were given part in the first resurrection and lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years (Rev 20 4). The "beast" symbolizes the anti-Christian empires, particularly Rome under Nero, who sought to devour and destroy the early Christians.

(8) μώλωψ, mōlōps, "bruise," Sir 23 10 (RV "bruise"); 28 17. DWIGHT M. PRATT

MARK, märk, JOHN: John (Ἰωάννης, Iōánnēs) represents his Jewish, Mark (Μάρκος, Márkos) his Rom name. Why the latter was assumed we do not know. Perhaps the

1. Name and Family aorist participle in Acts 12 25 may be intended to intimate that it dated from the time when, in company with Barnabas and Saul, he turned to service in the great gentile city of Antioch. Possibly it was the badge of Rom citizenship, as in the case of Paul. The standing of the family would be quite consistent with such a supposition.

His mother's name was Mary (Acts 12 12). The home is spoken of as hers. The father was probably dead. The description of the house (with its large room and porch) and the mention of the Gr slave, suggest a family of wealth. They were probably among the many zealous Jews who, having become rich in the great world outside, retired to Jerus, the center of their nation and faith. M. was "cousin" to Barnabas of Cyprus (Col 4 10) who also seems to have been a man of means (Acts 4 36). Possibly Cyprus was also M.'s former home.

When first mentioned, M. and his mother are already Christians (44 AD). He had been converted through Peter's personal influence (1 Pet 5 13) and had already

2. His History as Known from the NT won a large place in the esteem of the brethren, as is shown by his being chosen to accompany Barnabas and Saul to Antioch, a little later. The home was a resort for Christians, so that M. had every opportunity to become acquainted with other leaders such as James and John, and James the brother of the Lord. It was perhaps from the latter James that he learned the incident of Mk 3 21 which Peter would be less likely to mention.

His kinship with Barnabas, knowledge of Christian history and teaching, and proved efficiency account for his being taken along on the first missionary journey as "minister" (ὑπηρετής, hypérētēs) to Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 5). Just what that term implies is not clear. Chase (HDB) conjectures the meaning to be that he had been hypérētēs, "attendant" or hazzān in the synagogue (cf Lk 4 20), and was known as such an official. Wright (ET, February, 1910) suggests that he was to render in newly founded churches a teaching service similar to that of the synagogue hazzān. Hackett thought that the kaí of this verse implies that he was to be doing the same kind of work as Barnabas and Saul and so to be their "helper" in preaching and teaching. The more common view has been (Meyer, Swete, et al.) that he was to perform "personal service not evangelistic," "official service but not of the menial kind"—to be a sort of business agent. The view that he was to be a teacher, a catechist for converts, seems to fit best all the facts.

Why did he turn back from the work (Acts 13 13)? Not because of homesickness, or anxiety for his mother's safety, or home duties, or the desire to rejoin Peter, or fear of the perils incident to the journey, but rather because he objected to the offer of salvation to the Gentiles on condition of faith alone. There are hints that M.'s family, like Paul's, were Hebrews of the Hebrews, and it is not without significance that in both verses (Acts 13 5.13) he is given only his Heb name. The terms of Paul's remonstrance are very strong (Acts 15 38), and we know that nothing stirred Paul's feelings more deeply than this very question. The explanation of it all may be found in what happened at Paphos when the Rom Sergius Paulus became a believer. At that time Paul (the change of name is here noted by Lk) stepped to the front, and henceforth, with the exception of 15 12.25, where naturally enough the old order is maintained, Lk speaks of Paul and Barnabas, not Barnabas and Saul. We must remember that, at that time, Paul stood almost alone in his conviction. Barnabas, even later than that, had misgivings (Gal 2 13). Perhaps, too, M. was less able than Barnabas himself to see the latter take second place.

We hear nothing further of M. until the beginning of the second missionary journey 2 years later, when Paul's unwillingness to take him with them led to the rupture between Paul and Barnabas and to the mission of Barnabas and M. to Cyprus (Acts 15 39). He is here called Mark, and in that quiet way Luke may indicate his own conviction that Mark's mind had changed on the great question, as indeed his willingness to accompany Paul might suggest. He had learned from the discussions in the council at Jerus and from subsequent events at Antioch.

About 11 years elapse before we hear of him again (Col 4 10f; Philem ver 24). He is at Rome with Paul. The breach is healed. He is now one of the faithful few among Jewish Christians who stand by Paul. He is Paul's honored "fellow-worker" and a great "comfort" to him.

The Colossian passage may imply a contemplated visit by M. to Asia Minor. It may be that it was carried out, that he met Peter and went with him to Babylon. In 1 Pet 5 13 the apostle sends M.'s greeting along with that of the church in Babylon. Thence M. returns to Asia Minor, and in 2 Tim 4 11 Paul asks Timothy, who is at Ephesus, to come to him, pick up M. by the way, and bring him along. In that connection Paul pays M. his final tribute; he is "useful for ministering" (εὐχρηστος εἰς διακονίαν, eúchrēstos eis diakonían), so useful that his ministry is a joy to the veteran's heart.

The most important and reliable tradition is that he was the close attendant and interpreter of Peter, and has given us in the Gospel that bears his name an account of Peter's teaching. For that comradeship the NT facts furnish a basis, and the gaps in the NT history leave plenty of room. An examination of the tradition will be found in MARK, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO (q.v.).

Other traditions add but little that is reliable. It is said that M. had been a priest, and that after becoming a Christian he amputated a finger to disqualify himself for that service. Hence the nickname κολοβοδάκτυλος, kolobodáktylos, which, however, is sometimes otherwise explained. He is represented as having remained in Cyprus until after the death of Barnabas (who was living in 57 AD according to 1 Cor 9 5 f) and then to have gone to Alexandria, founded the church there, become its first bishop and there died (or was martyred) in the 8th year of Nero (62-63). They add that in 815 AD Venetian soldiers stole his remains from Alexandria and placed them under the church of St. Mark at Venice.

LITERATURE

I. Our Second Gospel.—The order of the Gospels in our NT is probably due to the early conviction that this was the order in which the Gospels were written. It was not, however, the invariable order. The question of order only arose when the roll was superseded by the codex, our present book-form. That change was going on in the 3d cent. Origen found codices with the order Jn, Mt, Mk, Lk—due probably to the desire to give the apostles the leading place. That and the one common today may be considered the two main groupings—the one in the order of dignity, the other in that of time. The former is Egypt and Lat; the latter has the authority of most Gr MSS, Catalogues and Fathers, and is supported by the Old Syr.

Within these, however, there are variations. The former is varied thus: Jn, Mt, Lk, Mk, and Mt, Jn, Mk, Lk, and Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk; the latter to Mt, Mk, Jn, Lk. Mk is never first; when it follows Lk, the time consideration has given place to that of length.

II. Contents and General Characteristics.—The Gospel begins with the ministry of John the Baptist and ends with the announcement of the Resurrection, if the last 12 vs be not included. These add post-resurrection appearances, the Commission, the Ascension, and a brief summary of apostolic activity. Thus its limits correspond closely with those indicated by Peter in Acts 10 37-43. Nothing is said of the early Judaean ministry. The Galilean ministry and Passion Week with the transition from the one to the other (in ch 10) practically make up the Gospel.

Matter peculiar to Mk is found in 4 26-29 (the seed growing secretly); 3 21 (his kindred's fear); 7 32-37 (the deaf and dumb man); 2. Material 8 22-26 (the blind man); 13 33-37 Peculiar to (the householder and the exhortation Mark to watch); 14 51 (the young man who escaped). But, in addition to this, there are many vivid word-touches with which the common material is lighted up, and in not a few of the common incidents Mk's account is very much fuller; e.g. 6 14-29 (death of John the Baptist); 7 1-23 (on eating with unwashed hands); 9 14-29 (the demoniac boy); 12 28-34 (the questioning scribe). There is enough of this material to show clearly that the author could not have been wholly dependent on the other evangelists. Hawkins reckons the whole amount of peculiar material at about fifty verses (Hor. Syn., 11).

In striking contrast to Matthew who, in 11 passages, calls attention to the fulfilment of prophecy by Jesus,

3. Quota- Mark only once quotes the OT and that he puts in the very forefront of his Gospel. The Isa part of his composite quotation appears in all 4 Gospels; the Mal part in Mk only, though there is a reflection of it in Jn 3 28. This fact alone might convey an erroneous impression of the attitude of the Gospel to the OT. Though Mark himself makes only this one twofold reference, yet he represents Jesus as doing so frequently. The difference in this respect between him and Matthew is not great. He has 19 formal quotations as compared with 40 in Mt, 17 in Lk and 12 in Jn. Three of the 19 are not found elsewhere. The total for the NT is 160, so that Mk has a fair proportion. When OT references and loose citations are considered the result is much the same. WH give Mt 100, Mk 58, Lk 86, Jn 21, Acts 107. Thus the OT lies back of Mk also as the authoritative word of God. Swete (Intro to the OT in Gr, 393) points out that in those quotations which are common to the synoptists the LXX is usually followed; in others, the Heb more frequently. (A good illustration is seen in Mk 7 7 where the LXX is followed in the phrase, "in vain do they worship me"—a fair paraphrase of the Heb; but "teaching as their doctrines the precepts of men" is a more correct representation of the Heb than the LXX gives.) Three quotations are peculiar to Mk, viz. 9 48; 10 19; 12 32.

Judged by the space occupied, Mk is a Gospel of deeds. Jesus is a worker. His life is one of strenuous activity. He hastens from one task to another with energy and decision. The word εὐθύς, euthus, i.e. "straightway," is used 42 t as against Mt's 7 and Lk's 1. In 14 of these, as compared with 2 in Mt and none in Lk, the word is used of the personal activity of Jesus.

4. A Book of Mighty Works It is not strange therefore that the uneventful early years should be passed over (cf Jn 2 11). Nor is it strange that miracles should be more numerous than parables. According to Westcott's classification (Intro to Study of the Gospels, 480-86), Mk has 19 miracles and only 4 parables, whereas the corresponding figures for Mt are 21 to 15 and for Lk 20 to 19. Of the miracles 2 are peculiar to Mk, of the parables only 1. The evangelist clearly records the deeds rather than the words of Jesus. These facts furnish another point of contact with Peter's speeches in Acts—the beneficent character of the deeds in Acts 10 38, and their evidential significance in Acts 2 22 (cf Mk 1 27; 2 10, etc).

The following are the miracles recorded by Mk: the unclean spirit (1 21-28), the paralytic (2 1-12), the withered hand (3 1-5), the storm stilled (4 35-41), the Gerasene demoniac (5 1-17), Jairus' daughter (5 22 ff), the woman with the issue (5 25-34), feeding the 5,000 (6 35-44), feeding the 4,000 (8 1-10), walking on the water (6 48 ff); the Syrophenician's daughter (7 24-30), the deaf mute (7 31-37), the blind man (8 22-26), the demoniac boy (9 14 ff), blind Bartimaeus (10 46-52), the fig tree withered (11 20 ff), the resurrection (16 1 ff). For an interesting classification of these see Westcott's Intro to Study of the Gospels, 391. Only the last three belong to Judaea.

Though what has been said is true, yet Mk is by no means silent about Jesus as a teacher. John the Baptist is a preacher (1 4, 7), and

5. The Worker a Teacher Jesus also is introduced as a preacher, taking up and enlarging the message of John. Very frequent mention is made of Him as teaching (e.g. 1 21; 2 13; 6 6, etc); indeed the words διδάχῃ, didachē, and διδάσκω, didaskō, occur more frequently in Mk than in any other Gospel. Striking references are made to His originality, methods, popularity and peerlessness as a teacher (1 22; 4 1 f. 33; 11 27-12 37; esp. 12 34). A miracle is definitely declared to be for the purpose of instruction (2 10), and the implication is frequent that His miracles were not only the dictates of His compassion, but also purposed self-revelations (5 19 f.; 11 21-23). Not only is He Himself a teacher, but He is concerned to prepare others to be teachers (3 13 f.; 4 10 f). Mk is just as explicit as Mt in calling attention to the fact that at a certain stage He began teaching the multitude in parables, and expounding the parables to His disciples (4 2-11 f). He mentions, however, only four of them—the Sower (4 1-20), the Seed Growing Secretly (4 26-29), the Mustard Seed (4 30-32) and the Husbandmen (12 1-12). The number of somewhat lengthy discourses and the total amount of teaching is considerably greater than is sometimes recognized. Chs 4 and 13 approach most nearly to the length of the discourses in Mt and correspond to Mt 13 and 24 respectively. But in 7 1-23; 9 33-50; 10 5-31. 39-45 and 12 1-44 we have quite extensive sayings. If Jesus is a worker, He is even more a teacher. His works prepare for His words rather than His words for His works. The teachings grew naturally out of the occasion and the circumstances. He did and taught. Because He did what He did He could teach with effectiveness. Both works and words reveal Himself.

There is a multitude of graphic details: Mk mentions actions and gestures of Jesus (7 33; 9 36; 10 16) and His looks of inquiry

6. Graphic Details (5 32), in prayer (6 41; 7 34), of approval (3 34), love (10 21), warning (to Judas esp. 10 23), anger (3 5), and in judgment (11 11). Jesus hungers (11 12), seeks rest in seclusion (6 31) and sleeps on the boat cushion (4 38); He pities the multitude (6 34), wonders at men's unbelief (6 6), sighs over their sorrow and blindness (7 34; 8 12), grieves at their hardening (3 5), and rebukes in sadness the wrong thought of His mother and brothers, and in indignation the mistaken zeal and selfish ambitions of His disciples (8 33; 10 14). Mk represents His miracles of healing usually as instantaneous (1 31; 2 11 f.; 3 5), sometimes as gradual or difficult (1 26; 7 32-35; 9 26-28), and once as flatly impossible "because of their unbelief" (6 6). With many vivid touches we are told of the behavior of the people and the impression made on them by what Jesus said or did. They bring their sick along the streets and convert the market-place into a hospital (1 32), throng and jostle Him by the seaside (3 10), and express their astonishment at His note of authority (1 22) and power (2 12). Disciples are awed by His command over the sea (4 41), and disciples and others are surprised and alarmed at the strange look of dread as He walks ahead alone, going up to Jerus and the cross (10 32). Many other picturesque details are given, as in 1 13 (He was with the wild beasts); 2 4 (digging through the roof); 4 38 (lying asleep on the cushion); 5 4 (the description of the Gerasene demoniac); 6 39 (the companies, dressed in many colors and looking like flower beds on the green mountain-side). Other details peculiar to Mk are: names (1 29; 3 6; 13 3; 15 21), numbers (5 13; 6 7), time (1 35; 2 1; 11 19; 16 2), and place (2 13; 3 8; 7 31; 12 41; 13 3; 14 68 and 15 39). These strongly suggest the observation of an eyewitness as the final authority, and the geographical references suggest that even the writer understood the general features of the country, esp. of Jerus and its neighborhood. (For complete lists see Lindsay, St. Mark's Gospel, 26 ff.)

III. Text.—Of the 53 select readings noted by WH (Intro), only a few are of special interest or importance. The following are to be accepted: ἐν τῷ Ἰσαία τῷ προφῆτῃ (1 2); ἀμαρτηματος (3 29); πλήρης (indeclinable, 4 28); ὁ τέκτων (6 3; Jesus is here called "the carpenter"); αὐτοῦ (6 22, Herod's daughter probably had two names, Salome and Herodias); πυγμῇ (7 23, "with the fist," i.e. "thoroughly," not πυκνά, "oft"). WH are to be followed in rejecting πιστεῦσαι (leaving the graphic Τὸ Εἰ δύνῃ [9 23]); καὶ νηστεία (9 29); πᾶσα . . . ἀλισθήσεται (9 49); τοὺς . . . χρήμασι (10 24); but not in rejecting υἱοῦ θεοῦ (1 1). They are probably wrong in retaining οὐς . . . ὠνόμασαν (3 14; it was probably added from Lk 6 31); and in rejecting καὶ κλινῶν and accepting ραντίζονται instead of βαπτίζονται (7 4; ignorance of the extreme scrupulosity of the Jews led to these scribal changes; cf Lk 11 38, where ἐβαπτίσθη is not disputed). So one may doubt ἡπόρει (6 20), and suspect it of being an Alexandrian correction for ἐπολεῖ, which was more difficult and yet is finely appropriate.

The most important textual problem is that of 16 9-20. Burgon and Miller and Salmon believe it to be genuine. Miller supposes that up to that point Mk had been giving practically Peter's words, that for some reason those then failed him and that vs 9-20 are drawn from his own stores. The majority of scholars regard them as non-Markan; they think ver 8 is not the intended conclusion; that if Mark ever wrote a conclusion, it has been lost, and that vs 9-20, embodying traditions of the Apostolic Age, were supplied later. Conybeare has found in an Armenian MS a note referring these verses to the presbyter Ariston, whom he identifies with that Ariston, a disciple of John, of whom Papias speaks. Many therefore would regard them as authentic, and some accept them as clothed with John's authority. They are certainly very early, perhaps as early as 100 AD, and have the support of ACDX<sup>2</sup>ΔZ, all late uncials, all cursives, most VSS and Fathers, and were known to the scribes of A and B, who, however, do not accept them.

It is just possible that the Gospel did end at ver 8. The very abruptness would argue an early date when Christians lived in the atmosphere of the Resurrection and would form an even appropriate closing for the Gospel of the Servant (see below). A Servant comes, fulfils his task, and departs—we do not ask about his lineage, nor follow his subsequent history.

IV. Language.—Mark employs the common colloquial Gr of the day, understood everywhere throughout the Gr-Rom world. It

1. General was emphatically the language of the Character people, "known and read of all men."

His vocabulary is equally removed from the technicalities of the schools and from the slang of the streets. It is the clean, vigorous, direct speech of the sturdy middle class.

2. Vocabulary

Of his 1,330 words, 60 are proper names. Of the rest 79 are peculiar to Mk, so far as the NT is concerned; 203 are found elsewhere only in the Synoptics, 15 only in John's Gospel, 23 only in Paul (including He), 2 in the Catholic Epp. (1 in Jas, 1 in 2 Pet), 5 in the Apocalypse (see Swete, Comm. on St. Mark). Rather more than a fourth of the 79 are non-classical as compared with one-seventh for Lk and a little more than one-seventh for Mt. Hawkins also gives a list of 33 unusual words or expressions. Most interesting of the single words are σχιζόμενος, σχιζομένους, ἤφεν, ἔφην, κομπούλας, κόμποροις, ἐκφαλωσαν, ἐκρηγίλσαν, προαίλιον, προαίλιον, and ὄτι, ἥδι, in the sense of "why" (2 16; 9 11, 28); of the expressions, the distributives in 6 7, 39 f and 14 19, the Hebraistic εἰ δοθήσεται, and ὅταν with Indic. Of ordinary constructions the following are of note with marked frequency: καὶ (reducing his use of δε to half of Mt's or Lk's), historic present (accounting for the very frequent use of λέγει instead of εἶπεν), the periphrastic Imperfect, the art. with infinitives or sentences, participles, and prepositions.

There are indications that the writer in earlier life was accustomed to think in Aramaic. Occasionally that fact shows itself in the retention of Aram. words which are proportionately rather more numerous than in Mt and twice as numerous as in Lk or Jn. The most interesting of these are ταλειθά κοῦμ, ταλειθά κοῦμ, ἐφφαθά, ἐφφαθά, and Βοανηργές, Βοανηργές, each uttered at a time of intense feeling.

Latinisms in Mk are about half as numerous as Aramaisms. They number 11, the same as in Mt, as compared with 6 in Lk and 7 in Jn. The greater proportion in Mk is the only really noteworthy fact in these figures. It suggests more of a Roman outlook and fits in with the common tradition as to its origin and authorship.

For certain words he has great fondness: εὐθύς, 42 t; ἀκάθαρτος, 11 t; βλέπω, and its compounds very frequently; 80 ἑρωτῶν, ὑπάγειν, ἐξουσία, εὐαγγέλιον, προσκαλεῖσθαι, ἐπιτιμᾶν, compounds of πορεύεσθαι, συζητεῖν, and such graphic words as ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι, ἐμβριμάσθαι, ἐναγκαλιζεσθαι and φιμοῦσθαι. The following he uses in an unusual sense: ἐνεῖχεν, πυγμῇ, ἀπεχεῖ, ἐπιβαλὼν.

The same exact and vivid representation of the facts of actual experience accounts for the anacolutha and other broken constructions, e.g. 4 31 f; 5 23; 6 8 f; 11 32. Some are due to the insertion of explanatory clauses, as in 7 3-5; some to the introduction of a quotation as in 7 11 f. These phenomena represent the same type of mind as we have already seen (II, 6 above).

The style is very simple. The common connective is καὶ. The stately periods of the classics are wholly absent. The narrative is 3. Style commonly terse and concise. At times, however, a multitude of details are crowded in, resulting in unusual fullness of expression. This gives rise to numerous duplicate expressions as in 1 32; 2 25; 5 19 and the like, which become a marked feature of the style. The descriptions are wonderfully vivid. This is helped out by the remarkably frequent use of the historic present, of which there are 151 examples, as contrasted with 78 in Mt and 4 in Lk, apart from its use in parables. Mk never uses it in parables, whereas Mt has 15 cases and Lk 5. Jn has 162, a slightly smaller proportion than Mk on the whole, but rather larger in narrative parts. But Mk's swift passing from one tense to another adds a variety and vividness to the narrative not found in Jn.

That the original language was Gr is the whole impression made by patristic references. Trans-

4. Original Language into, Gr. It was the common language of the Rom world, esp. for letters. Paul wrote to the Romans in Gr. Half a century later Clement wrote from Rome to Corinth in Gr. The Gr Mk bears the stamp of originality and of the individuality of the author.

Some have thought it was written in Lat. The only real support for that view is the subscription in a few MSS (e.g. 160, 161, ἐγραψεν Ῥωμαῖσι ἐν Ῥώμῃ, ἐγγράφη Ῥωμαῖσι ἐν Ῥώμῃ) and in the Peshitta and Harclean Syr. It is a mistaken deduction from the belief that it was written in Rome or due to the supposition that "interpreter of Peter" meant that Mark tr<sup>d</sup> Peter's discourses into Lat.

Blass contended for an Aram. original, believing that Lk, in the first part of Acts, followed an Aram. source, and that that source was by the author of the Second Gospel which also, therefore, was written in Aramaic. He felt, moreover, that the text of Mk suggests several forms of the Gospel which are best explained as tr of a common original. Decisive against the view is the tr of the few Aram. words which are retained.

V. Authorship.—The external evidence for the authorship is found in the Fathers and the MSS.

The most important patristic statements are the following:

1. External Evidence

Papias—Asia Minor, c 125 AD—(quoted by Eus., HE, III, 39): "And this also the elder said: Mark, having become the interpreter (ἑρμηνευτής, hermeneutēs) of Peter, wrote accurately what he remembered (or recorded) of the things said or done by Christ, but not in order. For he neither heard the Lord nor followed Him; but afterward, as I said [he attached himself to] Peter who used to frame his teaching to meet the needs [of his hearers], but not as composing an orderly account (ὀρθρὰν, orthrān) of the Lord's discourses, so that Mark committed no error in thus writing down some things as he remembered them: for he took thought for one thing not to omit any of the things he had heard nor to falsify anything in them."

Justin Martyr—Palestine and the West, c 150 AD—(In Dial. with Trypho, cvi, Migne ed): "And when it is said that He imposed on one of the apostles the name Peter, and when this is recorded in his 'Memoirs' with this other fact that He named the two sons of Zebedee 'Boanerges,' which means 'Sons of Thunder,' etc."

Irenaeus—Asia Minor and Gaul, c 175 AD—(Adv. Haer., III, 1, quoted in part Eus., HE, V, 8): "After the apostles were clothed with the power of the Holy Spirit and fully furnished for the work of universal evangelization, they went out ["exierunt," in Rufinus' tr] to the ends of the earth preaching the gospel. Matthew went eastward to those of Heb descent and preached to them in their own tongue, in which language he also [had?] published a writing of the gospel, while Peter and Paul went westward and preached and founded the church in Rome. But after the departure [ἐξόδου, "exitum" in Rufinus] of these, Mark, the disciple and interpreter [ἐρμηνεύτης, hermēneutēs] of Peter, even he has delivered to us in writing the things which were preached by Peter."

Clement of Alexandria—c 200 AD—(Hypotyp. in Eus., HE, VI, 14): "The occasion for writing the Gospel acc. to Mk was as follows: After Peter had publicly preached the word in Rome and declared the gospel by the Spirit, many who were present entreated Mark, as one who had followed him for a long time and remembered what he said, to write down what he had spoken, and Mk, after composing the Gospel, presented it to his petitioners. When Peter became aware of it he neither eagerly hindered nor promoted it."

Also (Eus., HE, II, 15): "So charmed were the Romans with the light that shone in upon their minds from the discourses of Peter, that, not contented with a single hearing and the viva voce proclamation of the truth, they urged with the utmost solicitation on Mark, whose Gospel is in circulation and who was Peter's attendant, that he would leave them in writing a record of the teaching which they had received by word of mouth. They did not give over until they had prevailed on him; and thus they became the cause of the composition of the so-called Gospel according to Mk. It is said that when the apostle knew, by revelation of the Spirit, what was done, he was pleased with the eagerness of the men and authorized the writing to be read in the churches."

Tertullian—North Africa, c 207 AD—(Adv. Marc., iv, 5): He speaks of the authority of the four Gospels, two by apostles and two by companions of apostles, "not excluding that which was published by Mark, for it may be ascribed to Peter, whose interpreter Mark was."

Origen—Alexandria and the East, c 240 AD—"Comm. on Mt." quoted in Eus., HE, VI, 25): "The second is that according to Mk who composed it, under the guidance of Peter [ὁς Πέτρος διηγῆσάτο αὐτῷ, hōs Pētros hupēgēsato autō], who therefore, in his Catholic ep., acknowledged the evangelist as his son."

Eusebius—Caesarea, c 325 AD—(Dem. Evang., III, 5): "Though Peter did not undertake, through excess of diffidence, to write a Gospel, yet it had all along been currently reported, that Mark, who had become his familiar acquaintance and attendant [ὑπακόμος καὶ φοιτητής, hōnimos kai phoitētēs] made memoirs of [or recorded, ἀπομνημονεύσας, apomnēmonēusas] the discourses of Peter concerning the doings of Jesus." "Mark indeed writes this, but it is Peter who so testifies about himself, for all that is in Mk are memoirs (or records) of the discourses of Peter."

Epiphanius—Cyprus, c 350 AD—(Haer., 41): "But immediately after Matthew, Mark, having become a follower [ἀκόλουθος, akolouthos] of the holy Peter in Rome, is entrusted with the putting forth of a gospel. Having completed his work, he was sent by the holy Peter into the country of the Egyptians."

Jerome—East and West, c 350 AD—(De vir. illustr., viii): "Mark, disciple and interpreter of Peter, at the request of the brethren in Rome, wrote a brief Gospel in accordance with what he had heard Peter narrating. When Peter heard it he approved and authorized it to be read in the churches."

Also xi: "Accordingly he had Titus as interpreter just as the blessed Peter had Mark whose Gospel was composed, Peter narrating and Mark writing."

Preface Comm. on Mt.: "The second is Mark, interpreter of the apostle Peter, and first bishop of the Alexandrian church; who did not himself see the Lord Jesus, but accurately, rather than in order, narrated those of His deeds, which he had heard his teacher preaching."

To these should be added the Muratorian Fragment—c 170 AD—"which gives a list of the NT books with a brief account of the authorship of each. The account of Mt and most of that of Mk are lost, only these words relating to Mark being left: 'quibus tamen interfuit, et ita posuit'" (see below).

These names represent the churches of the 2d, 3d and 4th cents., and practically every quarter of the Rom world. Quite clearly the common opinion was that Mark had written a Gospel and in it had given us mainly the teaching of Peter.

That our second Gospel is the one referred to in these statements there can be no reasonable doubt. Our four were certainly the four of Irenaeus and Tatian; and Salmon (Intro) has shown that the same four must have been accepted by Justin, Papias and their contemporaries, whether orthodox or Gnostics. Justin's reference to the surname

"Boanerges" supports this so far as Mark is concerned, for in the Gospel of Mk alone is that fact mentioned (3 17).

A second point is equally clear—that the Gospel of Mk is substantially Peter's. Mark is called disciple, follower, interpreter of Peter. Origen expressly quotes "Marcus, my son" (1 Pet 5 13 AV) in this connection. "Disciple" is self-explanatory. "Follower" is its equivalent, not simply a traveling companion. "Interpreter" is less clear. One view equates it with "translator," because Mark tr'd either Peter's Aram. discourses into Gr for the Hellenistic Christians in Jerus (Adeney, et al.), or Peter's Gr discourses into Lat for the Christians in Rome (Swete, et al.). The other view—that of the ancients and most moderns (e.g. Zahn, Salmon)—is that it means "interpreter" simply in the sense that Mark put in writing what Peter had taught. The contention of Chase (HDB, III, 247) that this was a purely metaphorical use has little weight because it may be so used here. The conflict in the testimony as to date and place will be considered below (VII).

There is no clear declaration that Mark himself was a disciple of Jesus or an eyewitness of what he records. Indeed the statement of Papias seems to affirm the contrary. However, that statement may mean simply that he was not a personal disciple of Jesus, not that he had never seen Him at all.

The Muratorian Fragment is not clear. Its broken sentence has been differently understood. Zahn completes it thus: "[a]l[i] quibus tamen interfuit, et ita posuit," and understands it to mean that "at some incidents [in the life of Jesus], however, he was present and so put them down." Chase (HDB) and others regard "quibus tamen" as a literal tr of the Gr οἷς δέ, hois dé, and believe the meaning to be that Mark, who had probably just been spoken of as not continuously with Peter, "was present at some of his discourses and so recorded them." Chase feels that the phrase following respecting Luke: "Dominum tamen nūc ipse vidit in carne," compels the belief that Mark like Luke had not seen the Lord. But Paul, not Mark, may be there in mind, and further, this interpretation rather belittles Mark's association with Peter.

The patristic testimony may be regarded as summarized in the title of the work in our earliest MSS, viz. κατὰ Μάρκον, κατὰ Μάρκον. This phrase must refer to the author, not his source of information, for then it would necessarily have been κατὰ Πέτρον, κατὰ Πέτρον. This is important as throwing light on the judgment of antiquity as to the authorship of the First Gospel, which the MSS all entitle κατὰ Ματθαῖον, κατὰ Ματθαῖον.

The internal evidence offers much to confirm the tradition and practically nothing to the contrary. That Peter is back of it 2. Internal Evidence is congruous with such facts as the following:

(1) The many vivid details referred to above (III, 6) must have come from an eyewitness. The frequent use of λέγει, lēgei, in Mk and Mt where Lk uses εἶπεν, eipēn, works in the same direction.

(2) Certain awkward expressions in lists of names can best be explained as Mark's turning of Peter's original, e.g. 1 29, where Peter may have said, "We went home, James and John accompanying us." So in 1 36 (contrasted with Lk's impersonal description, Lk 4 42 f); Mk 3 16; 13 3.

(3) Two passages (9 6 and 11 21) describe Peter's own thought; others mention incidents which Peter would be most likely to mention: e.g. 14 37 and vs 66-72 (esp. impf. ἠρῶντο, ērēntō); 16 7; 7 12-23 (in view of Acts 10 15).

(4) In 3 7 the order of names suits Peter's Galilean standpoint rather than that of Mark in Jerus—Galilee, Judaea, Jerus, Peraea, Tyro, Sidon. The very artlessness of these hints is the best kind of proof that we are in touch with one who saw with his own eyes and speaks out of his own consciousness.

(5) Generally Mark, like Matthew, writes from the standpoint of the Twelve more frequently than Luke; and Mark, more frequently than Matthew, from the standpoint of the three most honored by Jesus. Cf Mk 5 37 with Mt 9 23, where Mt makes no reference to the three; the unusual order of the names in Lk's corresponding passage (8:51) suggests that James was his ultimate source. The language of Mk 9:14 is clearly from one of the three, Lk's may be, but Mt's is not. The contrast in this respect between the common synoptic material and Lk 9:51—18:14 lends weight to this consideration.

(6) The scope of the Gospel which corresponds to that outlined in Peter's address to Cornelius (Acts 10:37-41).

(7) The book suits Peter's character—impressionable rather than reflective, and emotional rather than logical. To such men arguments are of minor importance. It is deeds that count (Burton, Short Intro).

It may seem to militate against all this that the three striking incidents in Peter's career narrated in Mt 14:28-33 (walking on the water), 17:24-27 (tribute money), and 18:16-19 (the church and the keys), should be omitted in Mk. But this is just a touch of that fine courtesy and modesty which companionship with Jesus bred. We see John in his Gospel hiding himself in a similar way. These men are more likely to mention the things that reflect discredit on themselves. It is only in Mt's list of the Twelve that he himself is called "the publican." So "Peter never appears in a separate rôle in Mk except to receive a rebuke" (Bacon).

As to Mark's authorship, the internal evidence appears slight. Like the others, he does not obtrude himself. Yet for that very reason what hints there are become the more impressive.

There may be something in Zahn's point that the description of John as brother of James is an unconscious betrayal of the fact that the author's own name was John. There are two other passages, however, which are clearer and which reinforce each other. The story of the youth in 14:51 seems to be of a different complexion from other Gospel incidents. But if Mark himself was the youth, its presence is explained and vindicated. In that case it is likely that the Supper was celebrated in his own home and that the upper room is the same as that in Acts 12. This is favored by the fuller description of it in Mk, esp. the word "ready"—a most natural touch, the echo of the housewife's exclamation of satisfaction when everything was ready for the guests. It is made almost a certainty when we compare 14:17 with the parallels in Mt and Lk. Mt 26:20 reads: "Now when even was come, he was sitting at meat with the twelve disciples"; Lk 22:14: "And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the apostles with him"; while Mk has: "And when it was evening he cometh with the twelve." The last represents exactly the standpoint of one in the home who sees Jesus and the Twelve approaching; (And how admirably the terms "the twelve disciples," "the apostles" and "the twelve" suit Mt, Lk, and Mk respectively.) Such phenomena, undesigned (save by the inspiring Spirit), are just those that would not have been invented later, and become the strongest attestation of the reliability of the tradition and the historicity of the narrative. Modern views opposed to this are touched upon in what follows.

VI. Sources and Integrity.—We have seen that, according to the testimony of the Fathers, Peter's preaching and teaching are at least the main source, and that many features of the Gospel support that view. We have seen, also, subtle but weighty reasons for believing that Mark added a little himself. Need we seek further sources, or does inquiry resolve itself into an analysis of Peter's teaching?

B. Weiss believes that Mark used a document now lost containing mainly sayings of Jesus, called Logia (L) in the earlier discussions, but now commonly known as Q. In that opinion he has recently been joined by Sanday and Streeter. Harnack, Sir John Hawkins and Wellhausen have sought to reconstruct Q on the basis of the non-Markan matter in Mt and Lk. Allen extracts it from Mt alone, thinking that Mk also may have drawn a few sayings from it. Some assign a distinct source for ch 13. Streeter considers it a document written shortly after the fall of Jerus, incorporating a few utterances by Jesus and itself incorporated bodily by Mark. Other sources, oral or written, are postulated by Bacon for smaller portions and grouped under X. He calls the final redactor R—not Mark but a Paulinist of a radical type.

In forming a judgment much depends upon one's conception of the teaching method of Jesus and the apostles. Teaching and preaching are not synonymous terms. Mt sums up the early ministry in Galilee under "teaching, preaching and healing," and gives us the substance of that teaching as it impressed itself upon him. Mk reports less of it, but speaks of it more frequently than either Mt or Lk. Jesus evidently gave teaching a very large place, and a large proportion of the time thus spent was devoted to the special instruction of the inner circle of disciples. The range of that instruction was not wide. It was intensive rather than extensive. He held Himself to the vital topic of the kingdom of God. He must have gone over it again and again. He would not hesitate to repeat instructions which even chosen men found it so difficult to understand. Teaching by repetition was common then as it is now in the East. The word "catechize" (κατηχέω, katēchēō) implies that, and that word was used by Paul of Jewish (Rom 2:18) and by Luke of Christian teaching (Lk 1:4). See CATECHIST.

The novelty in His teaching was not in method so much as in content, authority and accompanying miraculous power (Mk 1:27). Certainly He was far removed from vain repetition. His supreme concern was for the spirit. Just as certainly He was not concerned about a mere reputation for originality or for wealth and variety of resources. He was concerned about teaching them the truth so effectively that they would be prepared by intellectual clearness, as well as spiritual sympathy, to make it known to others. And God by His Providence, so kind to all but so often thwarted by human self-will, was free to work His perfect work for Him and make all things work together for the furtherance of His purpose. Thus incidents occur, situations arise and persons of all types appear on the scene, calling forth fresh instruction, furnishing illustration and securing the presentation of truth in fulness with proper balance and emphasis and in right perspective.

Thus before His death the general character of that kingdom, its principles and prospects, were taught. That furnished the warp for the future Gospels. The essence, the substance and general form were the same for all the Twelve; but each from the standpoint of his own individuality saw particular aspects and was impressed with special details. No one of them was large enough to grasp it all, for no one was so great as the Master. And it would be strange indeed, though perhaps not so strange as among us, if none of them wrote down any of it. Ramsay, Salmon and Palmer are quite justified in feeling that it may have been put in writing before the death of Jesus. It may well be that Matthew wrote it as it lay in his mind, giving us substantially Harnack's Q. John and James may have done the same and furnished Luke his main special source. But whether it was written down then or not, the main fact to be noted is that it was lodged in their minds, and that the substance was, and the details through mutual conference increasingly became, their common possession. They did not understand it all—His rising from the dead, for example. But the words were lodged in memory, and subsequent events made their meaning clear.

Then follow the great events of His death and resurrection, and for forty days in frequent appearances He taught them the things concerning the kingdom of God and expounded in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself, esp. the necessity of His death and resurrection. These furnished the woof of the future Gospels. But even yet they are not equipped for their task. So He promises them His Spirit, a main part of whose work will be to bring to their remembrance all He had said, to lead them into all the truth, and show them things to come. When He has come they will be ready to witness in power.

The apostles' conception of their task is indicated in some measure by Peter when he insisted that an indispensable qualification in a successor to Judas was that he must have been with them from the beginning to the end of Christ's ministry, and so be conversant with His words and deeds. From the day of Pentecost onward they gave themselves preëminently to teaching. The thousands converted on that day continued in the teaching of the apostles. When the trouble broke out between Hebrews and Hellenists, the Seven were appointed because the apostles could not leave the word of God to serve tables. The urgency of this business may have been one reason why they stayed in Jerus when persecution scattered so many of the church (Acts 8 2). They were thus in close touch for years, not only through the struggle between Hebrews and Hellenists, but until the admission of the gentile Cornelius and his friends by Peter had been solemnly ratified by the church in Jerus and possibly until the Council had declared against the contention that circumcision was necessary for salvation. During these years they had every opportunity for mutual conference, and the vital importance of the questions that arose would compel them to avail themselves of such opportunities. Their martyr-like devotion to Jesus would make them quick to challenge anything that might seem a misrepresentation of His teaching. The Acts account of their discussions at great crises proves that conclusively. To their success in training others and the accuracy of the body of catechetical instruction Luke pays fine tribute when he speaks of the "certainty" or undoubted truth of it (Lk 1 4). Thus Jesus' post-resurrection expositions, the experience of the years and the guidance of the Spirit are the source and explanation of the apostolic presentation of the gospel.

Of that company Peter was the recognized leader, and did more than any other to determine the mold into which at least the post-resurrection teachings were cast. Luke tells us of many attempts to record them. He himself in his brief reports of Peter's addresses sketches their broad outlines. Mark, at the request of Rom Christians and with Peter's approval, undertook to give an adequate account. Two special facts influenced the result—one, the character of the people for whom he wrote; the other, the existence (as we may assume) of Matthew's Q. It would be natural for him to supplement rather than duplicate that apostolic summary. Moreover, since Q presented mainly the ethical or law side of Christianity the supplement would naturally present the gospel side of it—and so become its complement—while at the same time this presentation and the needs of the people for whom he specially writes make it necessary to add something from the body of catechetical material, oral or written, not included in Q, as his frequent καὶ ἔλεγεν, καὶ ἔλεγε, seems to imply (Buckley, 152 ff.). So Mk's is "the beginning of the Gospel." He introduces Jesus in the act of symbolically devoting Himself to that death for our sins and rising again, which constitutes the gospel and then entering upon His ministry by calling upon the people to "repent and believe in the gospel." The book is written from the standpoint of the resurrection, and gives the story of the passion and of the ministry in a perspective thus determined. About the same time it may be, Matthew, writing for Jewish Christians, combines this gospel side of the teaching with his own Q side of it, adding from the common stock or abridging as his purpose might suggest or space might demand. Later Luke does a similar service for Gr Christians (cf Harnack, The Twofold Gospel in the NT).

The only serious question about the integrity of the book concerns the last twelve vs, for a discussion of which see under III above. Some have suggested that 1 1-13 is akin to 16 9-20, and may have been added by the same hand. But while vocabulary and connection are main arguments against the genuineness of the latter, in both these respects 1 1-13 is bound up with the main body of the book. Nor is there sufficient reason for denying ch 13 as a true report of what Jesus said.

Wendling's theory of three strata assignable to three different writers—historian, poet, and theologian—is quite overdrawn. Barring the closing verses, there is nothing which can possibly demand anything more than an earlier and a later edition by Mark himself, and the strongest point in favor of that is Luke's omission of 6 45-8 26. But Hawkins gives other reasons for that.

VII. Date and Place of Composition.—Ancient testimony is sharply divided. The Paschal Chronicle puts it in 40 AD, and many MSS, both uncial and cursive (Harnack, Chronologie, 70, 124) 10 or 12 years after the Ascension. These Swete sets aside as due to the mistaken tradition that Peter began work in Rome in the 2d year of Claudius (42 AD). Similarly he would set aside the opinion of Chrysostom (which has some MSS subscriptions to support it) that it was written in Alexandria, as an error growing out of the statement of Eusebius (HE, II, 16) that Mark went to Egypt and preached there the Gospel he composed. This he does in deference to the strong body of evidence that it was written in Rome about the time of Peter's death. Still there remains a discrepancy between Irenaeus, as commonly understood, and the other Fathers. For, so understood, Irenaeus places it after the death of Peter, whereas Jerome, Epiphanius, Origen and Clement of Alexandria clearly place it within Peter's lifetime. But it does not seem necessary so to understand Irenaeus. It may be that it was composed while Peter was living, but only published after his death. Christopherson (1570 AD) had suggested that and supported it by the conjectural emendation of ἐκδοσιν, ἐκδοσιν, "surrendering," "imprisonment," for ἐξόδον, ἐξόδον, in Irenaeus. Grabe, Mill and others thought Irenaeus referred, not to Peter's death, but to his departure from Rome on further missionary tours. But if we take exodon in that sense, it is better to understand by it departure from Pal or Syria, rather than from Rome. Irenaeus' statement that the apostles were now fully furnished for the work of evangelization (Adv. Haer., iii.1) certainly seems to imply that they were now ready to leave Pal; and his next statement is that Matthew and Mark wrote their respective Gospels. And Eusebius (HE, III, 24) states explicitly that Matthew committed his Gospel to writing "when he was about" to leave Pal "to go to other peoples." The same may very possibly be true of Mark. If the fact be that Romans in Caesarea or Antioch made the request of Mark, we can easily understand how, by the time of Irenaeus, the whole incident might be transferred to Rome.

If this view be adopted, the date would probably not be before the council at Jerus and the events of Gal 2 11 ff. It is true the NT hints are that the apostles had left Jerus before that, but that they had gone beyond Syria is not likely. At any rate, at the time of the clash at Antioch they had not become so clear on the question touching Jews and Gentiles in the church as to be "fully furnished for the work of universal evangelization." But may it not be that Paul's strong statement of the seriousness of their error actually did settle those questions in the minds of the leaders? If so, and if, with new vision and ardor, they turn to the work of world-wide evangelism, that would be a natural and worthy occasion for the composition of the Gospel. The place may be Caesarea or Antioch, and the date not earlier than 50 AD. This is the simplest synthesis of the ancient testimony. Modern opinion as to date has ranged more widely than the ancient. Baur and Strauss were compelled by their tendency and mythical theories to place it in the 2d cent. Recent criticism tends strongly to a date in the sixties of the 1st cent., and more commonly the later sixties. This is based partly on hints in the Gospel itself, partly on its relation to Mt and Lk. The hints usually adduced are 2 26 and 13. The former, representing the temple as still standing, has force only if the relative clause be Mark's explanatory addition. Ch 13 has more force because, if Jerus had already fallen, we might expect some recognition of the fact.

Two other slight hints may be mentioned. The omission by the synoptists of the raising of Lazarus, and of the name of Mary in connection with the anointing of Jesus argues an early date when mention of them might have been unpleasant for the family. When the Fourth Gospel was published, they may have been no longer alive. The description of John as the brother of James (5 37) may also take us back to an early date when James was the more honored of the two brothers—though the unusual order of the names may be due, as Zahn thinks, to the author's instinctively distinguishing that John from himself.

The relation of Mk to Mt and Lk is important if the very widespread conviction of the priority of Mk be true. For the most likely date for Acts is 62 AD, as suggested by the mention of Paul's two years' residence in Rome, and Luke's Gospel is earlier than the Acts. It may well have been written at Caesarea about 60 AD; that again throws Mk back into the fifties.

The great objection to so early a date is the amount of detail given of the destruction of Jerus. Abbott and others have marshaled numerous other objections, but they have very little weight—most of them indeed are puerile. The real crux is that to accept an earlier date than 70 AD is to admit predictive prophecy. Yet to deny that, esp. for a believer in Christ, is an unwarranted pre-judgment, and even so far to reduce it as to deny its presence in this passage is to charge Luke—a confessedly careful historian—with ascribing to Jesus statements which He never made.

The eagerness to date Mt not earlier than 70 is due to the same feeling. But the problem here is complicated by the word "immediately" (24 29). Some regard that as proof positive that it must have been written before the destruction of Jerus. Others (e.g. Allen and Plummer) feel that it absolutely forbids a date much later than 70 AD, and consider 75 AD as a limit. But is it not possible that by εὐθὺς, εὐθέως (not παραχρῆμα, parachrēma), Christ, speaking as a prophet, may have meant no more than that the next great event comparable with the epochal overthrow of Judaism would be His own return and that the Divine purpose marches straight on from the one to the other? The NT nowhere says that the second advent would take place within that generation. See below under "Eschatology." There is therefore no sufficient reason in the Olivet discourse for dating Lk or Mt later than 60 AD, and if Mk is earlier, it goes back into the fifties.

VIII. Historicity.—Older rationalists, like Paulus, not denying Mark's authorship, regarded the miraculous elements as misconceptions of actual events. Strauss, regarding these as mythical, was compelled to postulate a 2d-cent. date. When, however, the date was pushed back to the neighborhood of 70 AD, the historicity was felt to be largely established. But recently the theory of "pragmatic values" has been developed; Bacon thus states it: "The key to all genuinely scientific appreciation of Bib. narrative . . . is the recognition of motive. The motive . . . is never strictly historical but always aetiological and frequently apologetic. . . . The evangelic tradition consists of so and so many anecdotes, told and retold for the purpose of explaining or defending beliefs and practices of the contemporary church" (Modern Comm., Beginnings of Gospel Story, 9). Bacon works out the method with the result that Mk is charged again and again with historical and other blunders. This view, like Baur's tendency-theory, has elements of truth. One is that the vocabulary of a later day may be a sort of necessary tr of the original expression. But tr is neither invention nor perversion. The other is that each author has his purpose, but that simply determines his selection and arrangement of material; it neither creates nor misrepresents it if the author be honest and well informed. The word "selection" is advisedly chosen. The evangelists did not lack material. Each of the Twelve had personal knowledge beyond the content of Q or of Mk. These represent the central orb—the one the ethical, the other the evangelic side of it—but there were rays of exceeding brightness radiating from it in all directions. Luke's introduction and John's explicit declaration attest that fact. And neither John nor Luke throws the slightest suspicion on the reliability of the material they did not use. There is no sufficient reason for charging them with misstating the facts to make a point. Bacon seems to trust any other ancient writers or even his own imagination rather than the evangelists. The test becomes altogether too subjective. Yet since Christianity is a historical revelation, perversion of history may become perversion of most vital religious teaching. In the last analysis, the critic undertakes to decide just what Jesus could or could not have done or said. The utter uncertainty of the result is seen by a comparison of Schmiedel and Bacon. The former is sure that the cry "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me" is one of the very few genuine sayings of Jesus; Bacon is equally sure that Jesus could not have uttered it. Bacon also charges Mark with "immoral crudity" because in 10 45 he reports Jesus as saying that He came "to give his life a ransom for [ἀντὶ, anti] many." Thus on two most vital matters he charges the evangelists with error because they run counter to his own religious opinions.

Plummer's remark is just (Comm. on Mt, xxxiii): "To decide a priori that Deity cannot become incarnate, or that incarnate Deity must exhibit such and such characteristics, is neither true philosophy nor scientific criticism." And A. T. Robertson ("Mt" in Bible for Home and School, 26): "The closer we get to the historic Jesus the surer we feel that He lived and wrought as He is reported in the Synoptic Gospels." The evangelists had opportunities to know the facts such as we have not. The whole method of their training was such as to secure accuracy. They support each other. They have given us sketches of unparalleled beauty, vigor and power, and have portrayed for us a Person moving among men absolutely without sin—a standing miracle. If we cannot trust them for the facts, there is little hope of ever getting at the facts at all.

IX. Purpose and Plan.—Mark's purpose was to write down the Gospel as Peter had presented it to Romans, so say the Fathers, at least, and internal evidence supports them. 1. The Gospel for Romans In any additions made by himself he had the same persons in mind. That the Gospel was for Gentiles can be seen (a) from the tr of the Aram. expressions in 3 17 (Boanerges), 5 41 (Talitha cumi), 7 11 (Corban), 10 46 (Bartimaeus), 14 36 (Abba), 15 22 (Golgotha); (b) in the explanation of Jewish customs in 14 12 and 15 42; (c) from the fact that the Law is not mentioned and the OT is only once quoted in Mark's own narrative; (d) the gentile sections, esp. in chs 6-8.

That it was for Romans is seen in (a) the explanation of a Gr term by a Lat in 12 42; (b) the preponderance of works of power, the emphasis on authority (2 10), patience and heroic endurance (10 17 ff); (c) 10 12 which forbids a practice that was not Jewish but Rom. Those who believe it was written at Rome find further hints in the mention of Rufus (15 21; cf Rom 16 13) and the resemblance between 7 1-23 and Rom 14. The Rom centurion's remark (15 39) is the Q.E.D. of the author, and bears the same relation to Mark's purpose as Jn 20 31 to John's.

But one cannot escape the feeling that we have in this Gospel the antitype of the Servant of Jehovah. A. B. Davidson (OT Theol., 365) tells us that there are two great figures around which Isaiah's thoughts gather—the King and the Servant. The former rises “to the unsurpassable height of ‘God with us,’ ‘mighty God,’ teaching that in Him God shall be wholly present with His people.” The Servant is the other. The former is depicted in Mt, who also identifies Him with the Servant (12 18 f); the latter by Mk who identifies Him with the Messianic King (11 10; 14 62). Davidson summarizes the description of the Servant: “(1) He is God’s chosen; (2) He has a mission to establish judgment on the earth. . . . The word is His instrument and the Lord is in the Word, or rather He Himself is the impersonation of it; (3) His endowment is the Spirit and an invincible faith; (4) There is in Him a marvelous combination of greatness and lowliness; (5) There are inevitable sufferings—bearing the penalty of others’ sins; (6) He thus redeems Israel and brings light to the Gentiles. (7) Israel’s repentance and restoration precede that broader blessing.” It is not strange that this Servant-conception—this remarkable blend of strength and submission, achieving victory through apparent defeat—should appeal to Peter. He was himself an ardent, whole-souled man who knew both defeat and victory. Moreover, he himself had hired servants (Mk 1 20), and now for years had been a servant of Christ (cf Acts 4 29). That it did appeal to him and became familiar to the early Christians can be seen from Acts 3 13 and 4 30. In his First Ep. he has 17 references to Isaiah, 9 of which belong to the second part. Temperamentally Mark seems to have been like Peter. And his experience in a wealthy home where servants were kept (Acts 12 13), and as himself hupêrētēs of apostles in Christian service, fitted him both to appreciate and record the character and doings of the perfect servant—the Servant of Jeh. For Rom Christians that heroic figure would have a peculiar fascination.

The plan of the Gospel seems to have been influenced by this conception. Christ’s kingship was apprehended by the Twelve at a comparatively early date. It was the Gospel not until after the resurrection, when Jesus opened to them the Scriptures, that they saw Him as the Suffering Servant of Isa 53. That gave Peter his gospel as we have already seen, and at the same time the general lines of its presentation. We see it sketched for Romans in Acts 10. That sketch is filled in for us by Mark. So we have the following analysis:

Title: 1 1

1. The Baptist preparing the way: 1 2–8; cf Isa 40 3 f.
2. Devotement of Jesus to death for us and endowment by the Spirit: 1 9–13; cf Isa 42 1 ff.
3. His greatness—the Galilean Ministry: 1 14–8 30; cf Isa 43–52 12.
  - (1) In the synagogue: period of popular favor leading to break with Pharisaic Judaism: 1 14–3 6.
  - (2) Outside the synagogue: parabolic teaching of the multitude, choice and training of the Twelve and their Great Confession: 3 7 ff–8 30.
4. His lowliness—mainly beyond Galilee: 8 31–15; cf Isa 52 13–53 9.
  - (1) In the north—announcement of death: 8 31–9 29.
  - (2) On the way to Jerus and the cross—through Galilee (9 30–50), Peraea (10 1–45), Judaea (10 46–52).
  - (3) The triumphal entry into Jerus (11 1–11).
  - (4) In Jerus and vicinity—opposed by the leaders (11 12–12 44); foretelling their doom (13); preparing for death (14 1–42); betrayed, condemned, crucified and buried in a rich man’s tomb (14 43–15).
5. His victory—the resurrection: Ch 16; cf Isa 53 10–12. What follows in Isa is taken up in Acts, for the first part of which Peter or Mark may have been Luke’s main source.

Generally speaking the plan is chronological, but it is plain that the material is sometimes grouped according to subject-matter.

This Servant-conception may also be the real explanation of some of the striking features of this Gospel, e.g. the absence of a genealogy and any record of His early life; the frequent use of the word “straightway”; the predominance of deeds; the Son’s not knowing the day (13 32); and the abrupt ending at 16 8 (see III).

X. Leading Doctrines.—The main one, naturally, is the Person of Christ. The thesis is that He is Messiah, Son of God, Author (Source) of the gospel. The first half of the book closes with the disciples’ confession of His Messiahship; the second, with the supreme demonstration that He is Son of God. Introductory to each is the Father’s declaration of Him as His Beloved Son (1 11; 9 7). That the sonship is unique is indicated in 12 6 and 13 32. At the same time He is the Son of Man—true man (4 38; 8 5; 14 34); ideal man as absolutely obedient to God (10 40; 14 36), and Head of humanity (2 10.28), their rightful Messiah or King (1 1; 14 62)—yet Servant of all (10 44 f); David’s Son and David’s Lord (12 37). The unique Sonship is the final explanation of all else, His power, His knowledge of both present (2 5.8; 8 17) and future (8 31; 10 39; 14 27; 13), superiority to all men, whether friends (1 7; 9 3 ff) or foes (12 34), and to superhuman beings, whether good (13 32) or evil (1 13.32; 3 27).

The Father speaks in 1 11; 9 7; is spoken of in 13 32; and spoken to in 14 36. The usual distinction between His fatherhood in relation to Christ and in relation to us is seen in 11 25; 12 6 and 13 32.

2. The Trinity The Spirit is mentioned in 1 8.10.12; 3 29 and 13 11. The last passage especially implies His personality.

As to salvation, the Son is God’s final messenger (12 6); He gives His life a ransom instead of many (10 45); His blood shed is thus the blood

3. Salvation of the covenant (14 24); that involves for Him death in the fullest sense, including rupture of fellowship with God (15 34). From the outset He knew what was before Him—only so can His baptism be explained (1 5.11; cf 2 20); but the horror of it was upon Him, esp. from the transfiguration onward (10 32; 14 33–36); that was the Divine provision for salvation: He gave His life (10 45). The human condition is repentance and faith (1 15; 2 5; 5 34.36; 6 5; 9 23; 16 16), though He bestows lesser blessings apart from personal faith (1 23–26 5 1–20; 6 35–43). The power of faith, within the will of God, is limitless (11 25); faith leads to doing the will of God, and only such as do His will are Christ’s true kindred (3 35). Salvation is possible for Gentile as well as Jew (7 24–30).

The eschatology of this Gospel is found chiefly in 8 34–9 1 and 13. In 9 1 we have a prediction of the overthrow of Jerus which is here given as a type and proof of His final coming for judgment and reward which He has had in mind in the preceding verses. Ch 13 is a development of this—the destruction of Jerus being meant in vs 5–23 and 28–31, the final coming in vs 24–27 and 32. The distinction is clearly marked by the pronouns raŭra, taŭta, and eketŭs, eketnēs, in vs 30 and 32 (cf Mt 24 34.36). In each passage (9 1; 13 30) the fall of Jerus is definitely fixed as toward the close of that generation; the time of the latter is known only to the Father (13 32). Between Christ’s earthly life and the Second Coming He is seated at the right hand of God (12 36; 16 19). The resurrection which He predicted for Himself (8 31; 9 31; 10 34) and which actually took place (ch 16), He affirms for others also (12 24-27).

J. H. FARMER

MARKET, mār'ket, MARKETPLACE, mār'ket-plās, MART, märt (מַרְתָּ, ma'ārābh, סַחַר, sāhar; ἀγορά, agorá): (1) Ma'ārābh, from a root meaning "trading" and hence goods exchanged, and so "merchandise" in RV, "market" in AV, occurs only in Ezk 27 13.17.19.25, and is tr<sup>d</sup> correctly "merchandise" in both ERV and ARV. (2) Sāhar means a "trading emporium," hence mart, and merchandise. It occurs only in Isa 23 3 (see MERCHANDISE). (3) Agora, from root meaning "to collect," means a "town meeting-place," "resort of the people," so a place where the public generally met to exchange views and wares. No doubt, the central place soon filling up, the people thronged the adjoining streets, and so in time each street thus used came to be called agora, "marketplace"; tr<sup>d</sup> "marketplace[s]" in 1 Esd 2 18; Tob 2 3; Mt 11 16; 20 3; 23 7; Mk 6 56; 7 4; 12 38; Lk 7 32; 11 43; 20 46; Acts 16 19; 17 17; "Market of Appius" in Acts 28 15 means, probably, "street" (see APPII FORUM).

The marketplace in NT times was the public open space, either simple or ornate, in town, city or country, where (Mk 6 56) the people congregated, not only for exchange of merchandise, but for one or more of the following purposes: (1) a place where the children came together to sing, dance and play, a "back-to-date" municipal recreation center (Mt 11 16.17; Lk 7 32); (2) a place for loafers, a sort of ancient, irresponsible labor bureau where the out-of-work idler waited the coming of an employer with whom he might bargain for his services, usually by the day (Mt 20 1-16); (3) a place where the proud pretender could parade in long robes and get public recognition, "salutations in the market-places," e.g. the scribes and Pharisees against whom Jesus emphatically warns His disciples (Mt 23 3-7; Mk 12 38; Lk 11 43; 20 46); (4) a place where the sick were brought for treatment, the poor man's sanatorium, a municipal hospital; Jesus "who went about doing good" often found His opportunity there (Mk 6 56); (5) a place of preliminary hearing in trials, where the accused might be brought before rulers who were present at the time, e.g. Paul and Silas at Philippi (Acts 16 19); (6) a place for religious and probably political or philosophical discussion (gossip also), a forum, a free-speech throne; no doubt often used by the early apostles not only as a place of proclaiming some truth of the new religion but also a place of advertisement for a coming synagogue service, e.g. Paul in Athens (Acts 17 17).

Wisd 15 12 (AV) has "They counted . . . our time here a market for gain," RV "a gainful fair," in "a keeping of festival," Gr πανηγυρισμός, panēgurismós, "an assembly of all." Such assemblies offered particular opportunities for business dealings.

5. His Teaching concerning Divorce

LITERATURE

It would be interesting to study marriage biologically and sociologically, to get the far and near historical and social background of it as an institution, esp. as it existed among the ancient Jews, and as it figures in the teaching of Jesus as recorded in the NT. For, like all social institutions, marriage, and the family which is the outcome of marriage, must be judged, not by its status at any particular time, but in the light of its history. Such a study of it would raise a host of related historic questions, e.g. What was its origin? What part has it played in the evolution and civilization of the race? What social functions has it performed? And then, as a sequel, Can the services it has rendered to civilization and progress be performed or secured in any other way? This, indeed, would call for us to go back even farther—to try to discover the psychology of the institution and its history, the beliefs from which it has sprung and by which it has survived so long. This were a task well worth while and amply justified by much of the thinking of our time; for, as one of the three social institutions that support the much challenged form and fabric of modern civilization, marriage, private property and the state, its continued existence, in present form at least, is a matter of serious discussion and its abolition, along with the other two, is confidently prophesied. "Marriage, as at present understood, is an arrangement most closely associated with the existing social status and stands or falls with it" (Bebel, Socialism and Sex, 199, Reeves, London; The Cooperative Commonwealth in Its Outline, Gronlund, 224). But such a task is entirely outside of and beyond the purpose of this article.

Neither the Bible in general, nor Jesus in particular, treats of the family from the point of view of the historian or the sociologist, but solely from that of the teacher of religion and morals. In short, their point of view is theological, rather than sociological. Moses and the prophets, no less than Jesus and His apostles, accepted marriage as an existing institution which gave rise to certain practical, ethical questions, and they dealt with it accordingly. There is nothing in the record of the teachings of Jesus and of His apostles to indicate that they gave to marriage any new social content, custom or sanction. They simply accepted it as it existed in the conventionalized civilization of the Jews of their day and used it and the customs connected with it for ethical or illustrative purposes. One exception is to be made to this general statement, viz. that Jesus granted that because of the exigencies of the social development Moses had modified it to the extent of permitting and regulating divorce, clearly indicating, however, at the same time, that He regarded such modification as out of harmony with the institution as at first given to mankind. According to the original Divine purpose it was monogamous, and any form of polygamy, and apparently of divorce, was excluded by the Divine idea and purpose. The treatment of the subject here, therefore, will be limited as follows: Marriage among the Ancient Hebrews and Other Semites; Betrothal as the First Formal Part of the Transaction; Wedding Ceremonies Connected with Marriage, esp. as Reflected in the NT; and Jesus' Sanction and Use of the Institution, Teaching concerning Divorce, etc.

With the Hebrews married life was the normal life. Any exception called for apology and explanation. "Any Jew who has not 1. Marriage a wife is no man" (Talmud). It was among the regarded as awaiting everyone on Hebrews reaching maturity; and sexual maturity comes much earlier indeed in the East than with us in the West—in what we call childhood. The ancient Hebrews, in common with all Orientals, regarded the family as the social unit. In this their view of it coincides with that of modern sociologists. Of the three great events in the family life, birth, marriage and death, marriage was regarded as the most important. It was a step that led to the gravest tribal and family consequences. In case of a daughter, if she should prove unsatisfactory to her husband, she would likely be returned to the ancestral home, discarded and discredited, and there would be almost inevitably a feeling of injustice engendered on one side, and a sense of mutual irritation between the families (Jgs 14 20; 1 S 18 19). If she failed to pass muster with her mother-in-law she would just as certainly have to go, and the results would be much the same (cf customs in China). It was a matter affecting the whole circle of relatives, and possibly tribal amity as well. It was natural and deemed necessary, therefore, that the selection of the wife and the arrangement of all contractual and financial matters connected with it should be decided upon by the parents or guardians of the couple involved. Though the consent of the parties was sometimes sought (Gen 24 8) and romantic attachments were not unknown (Gen 29 20; 34 3; Jgs 14 1; 1 S 18 20), the girl or woman in the case was not currently thought of as having a personal existence at her own disposal. She was simply a passive unit in the family under the protection and supreme control of father or brothers. In marriage, she was practically the chattel, the purchased possession and personal property of her husband, who was her ba'al or master (Hos 2 16), she herself being b'ulah (Isa 62 4). The control, however, was not always absolute (Gen 26 34; Ex 2 21).

The bargaining instinct, so dominant among Orientals then as now, played a large part in the transaction. In idea the family was a little kingdom of which the father was the king, or absolute ruler. There are many indications, not only that the family was the unit from which national coherence was derived, but that this unit was perpetuated through the supremacy of the oldest male. Thus society became patriarchal, and this is the key of the ancient history of the family and the nation. Through the expansion of the family group was evolved in turn the clan, the tribe, the nation, and the authority of the father became in turn that of the chief, the ruler, and the king. The Oriental cannot conceive, indeed, of any band, or clan, or company without a "father," even though there be no kith or kinship involved in the matter. The "father" in their thought, too, was God's representative, and as such he was simply carrying out God's purpose, for instance, in selecting a bride for his son, or giving the bride to be married to the son of another. This is as true of the far East as of the near East today. Accordingly, as a rule, the young people simply acquiesced, without question or complaint, in what was thus done for them, accepting it as though God had done it directly. Accordingly, too, the family and tribal loyalty overshadowed love-making and patriotism, in the larger sense. Out of this idea of the solidarity and selectness of the tribe and family springs the overmastering desire of the Oriental for progeny, and for the conservation of the family or the tribe at any cost. Hence the feuds, bloody and bitter, that persist between this family or tribe and another that has in any way violated this sacred law.

Traces of what is known as beena marriage are found in the OT, e.g. that of Jacob, where Laban claims Jacob's wives and children as his own (Gen 31 31,43), and that of Moses (Ex 2 21; 4 18). This is that form of marriage in which the husband is incorporated into the wife's tribe, the children belonging to her tribe and descent being reckoned on her side (cf W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 94). In Samson's case we seem to have an instance of what is known among Arabs as cadkat marriage (from cadak, "gift"), the kid here being the customary cadak (Jgs 14; 15 1; 18 4). There is no hint that he meant to take his wife home. It is differentiated from prostitution in that no disgrace is attached to it and the children are recognized as legitimate by the tribe. Such marriages make it easier to understand the existence of the matrarchate, or the custom of reckoning the descent of children and property through the mothers. The influence of polygamy would work in the same direction, subdividing the family into smaller groups connected with the several wives. There is, however, no clear evidence in the OT of polyandry (a plurality of husbands), though the Levirate marriage is regarded by some as a survival of it. In other words, polygamy among the Hebrews seems to have been confined to polygyny (a plurality of wives). It is easy to trace its chief causes: (1) desire for a numerous offspring ("May his tribe increase!"); (2) barrenness of first wife (as in Abraham's case); (3) advantages offered by marital alliances (e.g. Solomon); (4) the custom of making wives of captives taken in war (cf Ps 45 3,9); (5) slavery, which as it existed in the Orient almost implied it.

Betrothal with the ancient Hebrews was of a more formal and far more binding nature than the "engagement" is with us. Indeed, it was esteemed a part of the transaction of marriage, and that the most binding part. Among the Arabs today it is the only legal ceremony connected with marriage. Gen 24 58,60 seems to preserve for us an example of an ancient formula and blessing for such an occasion. Its central feature was the dowry (môhar), which was paid to the parents, not to the bride. It may take the form of service (Gen 29; 1 S 18 25). It is customary in Syria today, when the projected marriage is approved by both families, and all the financial preliminaries have been settled, to have this ceremony of betrothal. It consists in the acceptance before witnesses of the terms of the marriage as contracted for. Then God's blessing is solemnly asked on the union thus provided for, but to take place probably only after some months, or perhaps some years. The betrothal effected, all danger from any further financial fencing and bluffing now being at an end, happiness and harmony may preside over all the arrangements for the marriage day. Among the Jews the betrothal was so far regarded as binding that, if marriage should not take place, owing to the absconding of the bridegroom or the breach of contract on his part, the young woman could not be married to another man until she was liberated by a due process and a paper of divorce. A similar custom prevails in China and Japan, and in cases becomes very oppressive. The marriage may have been intended by the parents from the infancy of the parties, but this formality of betrothal is not entered on till the marriage is considered reasonably certain and measurably near. A prolonged interval between betrothal and marriage was deemed undesirable on many accounts, though often an interval was needed that the groom might render the stipulated service or pay the price—say a year or two, or, as in the case of Jacob, it might be seven years. The betrothed parties were legally in the position of a married couple, and unfaithfulness was “adultery” (Dt 22 23; Mt 1 19).

Polygamy is likely to become prevalent only where conditions are abnormal, as where there is a disproportionate number of females, as in tribal life in a state of war. In settled conditions it is possible only to those able to provide “dowry” and support for each and all of the wives.

The fact of polygamy in OT times is abundantly witnessed in the cases of Abraham, Jacob, the judges, David, Solomon, etc. It was prevalent in Issachar (1 Ch 7 4); among the middle class (1 S 1 1 f). But it is treated, even in the OT, as incompatible with the Divine ideal (Gen 2 24), and its original is traced to a deliberate departure from that ideal by Lamech, the Cainite (Gen 4 19). Kings are warned against it (Dt 17 17; cf Gen 29 31; 30). Noah, Isaac and Joseph had each only one wife, and Bible pictures of domestic happiness are always connected with monogamy (2 K 4; Ps 128; Prov 31; cf Sir 25 1; 26 1.13). Marriage is applied figuratively, too, to the union between God and Israel, implying monogamy as the ideal state. Nevertheless, having the advantage of precedent, it was long before polygamy fell into disuse in Heb society. Herod had nine wives at one time (Jos. Ant. XVII, 1, 2). Justin Martyr (Dial., 134, 141) reproaches Jews of his day with having “four or even five wives,” and for “marrying as many as they wish” (cf Talm.). It was not definitely and formally forbidden among Jews until c 1000 AD. It exists still among Jews in Moslem lands. Side by side with this practice all along has been the ideal principle (Gen 2 18) rebuking and modifying it. The legal theory that made the man “lord” of the wife (Gen 3 16; Tenth Commandment) was likewise modified in practice by the affection of the husband and the personality of the wife.

The difference between a concubine and a wife was largely due to the wife's birth and higher position and the fact that she was usually backed by relatives ready to defend her. A slave could not be made a concubine without the wife's consent (Gen 16 2).

There is a disappointing uncertainty as to the exact ceremonies or proceedings connected with marriage in Bible times. We have to paint our picture from passing allusions or descriptions, and from what we know of Jewish and Arab. customs.

In cases it would seem that there was nothing beyond betrothal, or the festivities following it (see Gen 24 3 ff). Later, in the case of a virgin, an interval of not exceeding a year came to be observed.

The first ceremony, the wedding procession, apparently a relic of marriage by capture (cf Jgs 5 30; Ps 45 15), was the first part of the proceedings. The bridegroom's “friends” (Jn 3 29) went, usually by night, to fetch the bride and her attendants to the home of the groom (Mt 9 15; Jn 3 29). The joyousness of it all is witnessed by the proverbial “voice of the bridegroom” and the cry, “Behold the bridegroom cometh!” (Jer 7 34; Rev 18 23). The procession was preferably by night, chiefly, we may infer, that those busy in the day might attend, and that, in accordance with the oriental love of scenic effects, the weird panorama of lights and torches might play an engaging and kindling part.

The marriage supper then followed, generally in the home of the groom. Today in Syria, as Dr. Mackie, of Beirut, says, when both parties live in the same town, the reception may take place in either home; but the older tradition points to the house of the groom's parents as the proper place. It is the bringing home of an already accredited bride to her covenanted husband. She is escorted by a company of attendants of her own sex and by male relatives and friends conveying on mules or by porters articles of furniture and decoration for the new home. As the marriage usually takes place in the evening, the house is given up for the day to the women who are busy robing the bride and making ready for the coming hospitality. The bridegroom is absent at the house of a relative or friend, where men congregate in the evening for the purpose of escorting him home. When he indicates that it is time to go, all rise up, and candles and torches are supplied to those who are to form the procession, and they move off. It is a very picturesque sight to see such a procession moving along the unlighted way in the stillness of the starry night, while, if it be in town or city, on each side of the narrow street, from the flat housetop or balcony, crowds look down, and the women take up the peculiar cry of wedding joy that tells those farther along that the pageant has started. This cry is taken up all along the route, and gives warning to those who are waiting with the bride that it is time to arise and light up the approach, and welcome the bridegroom with honor. As at the house where the bridegroom receives his friends before starting some come late, and speeches of congratulation have to be made, and poems have to be recited or sung in praise of the groom, and to the honor of his family, it is often near midnight when the procession begins. Meanwhile, as the night wears on, and the duties of robing the bride and adorning the house are all done, a period of relaxing and drowsy waiting sets in, as when, in the NT parable, both the wise and the foolish virgins were overcome with sleep. In their case the distant cry on the street brought the warning to prepare for the reception, and then came the discovery of the exhausted oil.

Of the bridegroom's retinue only a limited number would enter, their chief duty being that of escort. They might call next day to offer congratulations. An Arab. wedding rhyme says:

“To the bridegroom's door went the torch-lit array,
And then like goats they scattered away.”

With their dispersion, according to custom, the doors would be closed, leaving within the relatives and invited guests; and so, when the belated virgins of the parable hastened back, they too found themselves inexorably shut out by the etiquette of the occasion. The opportunity of service was past, and they were no longer needed.

At the home all things would be “made ready,” if possible on a liberal scale. Jn 2 gives a picture of a wedding feast where the resources were strained to the breaking point. Hospitality was here esp. a sacred duty, and, of course, greatly ministered to the joy of the occasion. An oriental proverb is significant of the store set by it:

“He who does not invite me to his marriage
Will not have me to his funeral.”

To decline the invitation to a marriage was a gross insult (Mt 22).

It was unusual in Galilee to have a “ruler of the feast” as in Judaea (Jn 2). There was no formal religious ceremony connected with the Heb marriage as with us—there is not a hint of such a thing in the Bible. The marriage was consummated by entrance into the “chamber,” i.e. the nuptial chamber (Heb hedher), in which stood the bridal bed with a canopy (huppāh), being originally the wife's tent (Gen 24 67; Jgs 4 17). In all lands of the dispersion the name is still applied to the embroidered canopy under which the contracting parties stand or sit during the festivities. In Arab. Syr and Heb the bridegroom is said to “go in” to the bride.

A general survey of ancient marriage laws and customs shows that those of the Hebrews are not a peculiar creation apart from those of other peoples. A remarkable affinity to those of other branches of the Sem races esp., may be noted, and striking parallels are found in the CH, with regard, e.g., to betrothal, dowry, adultery and divorce. But modern researches have emphasized the relative purity of OT sexual morality. In this, as in other respects, the Jews had a message for the world. Yet we should not expect to find among them the Christian standard. Under the new dispensation the keynote is struck by Our Lord's action. The significance of His attending the marriage feast at Cana and performing His first miracle there can hardly be exaggerated. The act corresponds, too, with His teaching on the subject. He, no less than Paul, emphasizes both the honorableness of the estate and the heinousness of all sins against it.

The most characteristic use of marriage and the family by Our Lord is that in which He describes the kingdom of God as a social order in which the relationship of men to God is like that of sons to a father, and their relation to each other like that between brothers. This social ideal, which presents itself vividly and continuously to His mind, is summed up in this phrase, "Kingdom of God," which occurs more than a hundred times in the Synoptic Gospels. The passages in which it occurs form the interior climax of His message to men. It is no new and noble Judaism, taking the form of a political restoration, that He proclaims, and no "far-off Divine event" to be realized only in some glorious apocalyptic consummation; but a kingdom of God "within you," the chief element of its communion with God, the loving relation of "children" to a "Father," a present possession. Future in a sense it may be, as a result to be fully realized, and yet present; invisible, and yet becoming more and more visible as a new social order, a conscious brotherhood with one common, heavenly Father, proclaimed in every stage of His teaching in spite of opposition and varying fortunes with unwavering certainty of its completion—this is the "kingdom" that Jesus has made the inalienable possession of the Christian consciousness. His entire theology may be described as a transfiguration of the family (see Peabody, Jesus Christ, and the Social Question, 149 ff; Holtzmann, NT Theology, I, 200; Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 62; B. Weiss, Bib. Theol. of the NT, I, 72, ET, 1882).

Beyond this Jesus frequently used figures drawn from marriage to illustrate His teaching concerning the coming of the kingdom, as Paul did concerning Christ and the church. There is no suggestion of reflection upon the OT teaching about marriage in His teaching except at one point, the modification of it so as to allow polygamy and divorce. Everywhere He accepts and deals with it as sacred and of Divine origin (Mt 19 9, etc), but He treats it as transient, that is of the "flesh" and for this life only.

A question of profound interest remains to be treated: Did Jesus allow under any circumstances the remarriage of a divorced person during the lifetime of the partner to the marriage? Or did

5. Divorce He allow absolute divorce for any cause whatsoever? Upon the answer to that question in every age depend momentous issues, social and civic, as well as religious. The facts bearing on the question are confessedly enshrined in the NT, and so the inquiry may be limited to its records. Accepting with the best scholarship the documents of the NT as emanating from the disciples of Jesus in the second half of the 1st cent. AD the question is, what did these writers understand Jesus to teach on this subject? If we had only the Gospels of Mark and Luke and the Epp. of Paul, there could be but one answer given: Christ did not allow absolute divorce for any cause (see Mk 10 2 ff; Lk 16 18; Gal 1 12; 1 Cor 7 10). The OT permission was a concession. He teaches, to a low moral state and standard, and opposed to the ideal of marriage given in Gen (2 23).

"The position of women in that day was far from enviable. They could be divorced on the slightest pretext, and had no recourse at law. Almost all the rights and privileges of men were withheld from them. What Jesus said in relation to divorce was more in defence of the rights of the women of His time than as a guide for the freer, fuller life of our day. Jesus certainly did not mean to recommend a hard and enslaving life for women. His whole life was one long expression of full understanding of them and sympathy for them" (Patterson, The Measure of a Man, 181 f).

Two sayings attributed to Christ and recorded by the writer or editor of the First Gospel (Mt 5 32; 19 9) seem directly to contravene His teaching as recorded in Mk and Lk. Here He seems to allow divorce for "fornication" (ei mē eti porneia, ei mē ept' porneia, "save for fornication"), an exception which finds no place in the parallels (cf 1 Cor 7 15, which allows remarriage where a Christian partner is deserted by a heathen). The sense here demands that "fornication" be taken in its wider sense (Hos 2 5; Am 7 17; 1 Cor 5 1). Divorce to a Jew carried with it the right of remarriage, and the words 'causeth her to commit adultery' (Mt 5 32) show that Jesus assumed that the divorced woman would marry again. Hence if He allowed divorce, He also allowed remarriage. A critical examination of the whole passage in Mt has led many scholars to conclude that the exceptive clause is an interpolation due to the Jewish-Christian compiler or editor through whose hands the materials passed. Others think it betrays traces of having been rewritten from Mk or from a source common to both Mt and Mk, and combined with a semi-Jewish tradition, in short, that it is due to literary revision and compilation. The writer or compiler attempted to combine the original sayings of Jesus and His own interpretation. Believing that Our Lord had not come to set aside the authority of Moses, but only certain Pharisaic exegesis, and supported, as doubtless he was, by a Jewish-Christian tradition of Pal, he simply interpreted Mk's narrative by inserting what he regarded as the integral part of an eternal enactment of Jeh. In doing this he was unconsciously inconsistent, not only with Mk and Lk, but also with the context of the First Gospel itself, owing to his sincere but mistaken belief that the Law of Moses must not be broken. The view implied by the exception, of course, is that adultery ipso facto dissolves the union, and so opens the way to remarriage. But remarriage closes the door to reconciliation, which on Christian principles ought always to be possible (cf Hosea; Jer 3; Hermas, Mand. iv.1). Certainly much is to be said for the view which is steadily gaining ground, that the exception in Mt is an editorial addition made under the pressure of local conditions and practical necessity, the absolute rule being found too hard (see HDB, extra vol. 27b, and The Teaching of Our Lord as to the Indissolubility of Marriage, by Stuart Lawrence Tyson, M.A. Oxon., University of the South, 1912).

The general principle expanded in the NT and the ideal held up before the Christians is high and clear. How far that ideal can be embodied in legislation and applied to the community as a whole all are agreed must depend upon social conditions and the general moral development and environment. MARROW, mar'ō (מָרֹה, mō'h, מֶרֶץ, hēlebēh, שֶׁקֶרֶץ, shikkūy, מֶהָה, māhāh, "to make fat," "to grease"; μῆλος, muelós): Marrow is the nourisher and strengthener of the bones; it is said to moisten the bones: "The marrow [mō'h] of his bones is moistened" (Job 21 24). The fear of Jeh "will be health to thy navel, and marrow [shikkūy, m "refreshing, Heb moistening"] to thy bones" (Prov 3 8). Thus the expression is used figuratively of the things which alone can satisfy the soul: "My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow [hēlebēh, "fat"] and fatness" (Ps 63 5); "In this mountain will Jeh of hosts make unto all peoples a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow [מֶמְחָיִים, m'muḥāyim, part. pl., Pual of māhāh], of wines on the lees well refined" (Isa 25 6). In the Ep. to the He the writer speaks of the word of God, which is "living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow" (He 4 12). MARSENA, mār-se'na, mār'se-na (מַרְסֵנָה, mar-ṣnā'; derivation unknown but probably of Pers origin [Est 1 14]): One of "the seven princes of Persia and Media, who saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom."

MARSH, märsh ([1] מַרְשָׁה, gebhe', ARV "marsh," AV and ERV "marish" [Ezk 47 11]; AV "pit," RV "cistern" [Isa 30 14]; cf Arab. جَبَا, jaba', "reservoir," "watering-trough"; [2] בִּצְעָה, bōc, "mire"; בִּצְעָה, biṣṣāh, "mire," "fen"; cf Arab. بَضْ, baḍḍa, to "trickle," بَضْض, baḍḍa, "a little water"; [3] טִיט, ṭīt, "mire," "clay"; [4] חֹמֶר, hōmer, "mire," "clay," "mortar"; [5] מַעֲבְהָהּ הָאֶדְמָה, ma'ābhēh hā-'ādhāmāh [1 K 7 46], and עֲבֵהּ הָאֶדְמָה, 'ābhē hā-'ādhāmāh [2 Ch 4 17], "clay ground"): In the vision of Ezekiel the saltiness of the Dead Sea is "healed" by the stream issuing from under the threshold of the temple, "But the miry places [biṣṣāh] thereof, and the marshes [gebhe'] thereof, shall not be healed" (Ezk 47 11). Gebhe' occurs elsewhere only in Isa 30 14, where AV has "pit" and RV "cistern." Bōc, "mire," is found only in Jer 38 22. Biṣṣāh is found also in Job 8 11,

"Can the rush grow up without mire [biṣṣāh]?
Can the flag grow without water?"

and in Job 40 21 (of the behemoth),

"He lieth under the lotus-trees,
In the covert of the reed, and the fen [biṣṣāh]."

In 1 Macc 9 42.45 ἔλως, hēlos, but in ver 42 B reads ὄρος, ōros, "mount."

Marshes are found near the mouths of some of the rivers, as the Kishon, about the Haleh (? waters of Merom), at various places in the course of the Jordan and about the Dead Sea, esp. at its south end. For the most part Pal is rocky and dry.

MARS', märz, HILL. See AREOPAGUS.

MARSHAL, mär'shal: Not found in AV, but in RV the word represents two Heb words: (1) מַשְׁפָּה, šōphēr (Jgs 5 14), tr<sup>d</sup> "they that handle the marshal's staff." A difficulty arises because the usual meaning of šōphēr is "scribe" or "writer" (so AV). The revisers follow LXX and Gr authority which favor "marshal" as against "scribe." The office of marshal was against the general to maintain discipline (cf 1 Macc 5 42). (2) מַשְׁפָּטָר, šiphšār (Jer 51 27), a loan-word whose meaning is not clear. Lenormant thinks it akin to a Bab-Assyrian word meaning "tablet-writer" (cf Delitzsch). Accordingly, RVm renders Nah 3 17 "thy scribes," though the Syr has "thy warriors," as does the Tg in Jer. We must await further light on both words.

MART, märt. See MARKET.

MARTHA, mär'tha (Μάρθα, Mártha, "mistress," being a transliteration of the fem. form of מַר, mar, "Lord"): Martha belonged to Bethany, and was the sister of Lazarus and Mary (Jn 11 1 f). From the fact that the house into which Jesus was received belonged to Martha, and that she generally took the lead in action, it is inferred that she was the elder sister. Martha was one of those who gave hospitality to Jesus during His public ministry. Thus, in the course of those wanderings which began when "He stedfastly set his face to go to Jerus" (Lk 9 51), he "entered into a certain village"—its name is not stated—and "a certain woman named Martha received him into her house" (Lk 10 38). Martha, whose sense of responsibility as hostess weighed heavily upon her, was "cumbered about much serving," and her indignation was aroused at the lack of assistance given to her by her sister. Her words, "Lord, dost thou not care?" implied a certain reproach to Jesus also, in that she felt He showed a want of sympathy with her efforts and was the cause of Mary's remissness. But Jesus, in tones of gentle reproof, reminded her that for Him not the preparation of an elaborate meal but the hearing of His Word in the spirit of Mary was the "one thing needful" (Lk 10 39-42).

Martha is first mentioned by St. John—the only other Gospel writer who refers to Martha—in his account of the raising of Lazarus from the dead at Bethany (Jn 11 1-44). The narrative indicates, however, that Jesus was already on terms of the closest friendship with her and her household (cf vs 3.5). In the incident which St. John here records, Martha again displayed her more practical nature by going out to meet Jesus, while Mary sat in the house (ver 20). But she was not behind her sister in her love for her brother (ver 19), in her faith in Jesus (vs 21 f) and in her belief in the final resurrection (ver 24). The power of Him, whom she termed the "Teacher," to restore Lazarus to life even upon earth was beyond her understanding. To the words of Jesus concerning this she gave, however, a verbal assent, and went and informed Mary, "The Teacher is here, and calleth thee" (vs 27 f). Yet she remained inwardly unconvinced, and remonstrated when Jesus ordered the stone before the grave to be removed (ver 39). Jesus then recalled His previous words to her remembrance (ver 40), and vindicated them by restoring her brother to life (vs 41-44). After the raising of Lazarus, Jesus then made His departure, but after a short stay in Ephraim (ver 54) He returned to Bethany (Jn 12 1). While He supped there, Martha once more served, and Lazarus was also present (Jn 12 2). It was on this occasion that Mary anointed the feet of Jesus (Jn 12 3-8). According to Mt 26 6-13; Mk 14 3-9, the anointing took place in the house of Simon the leper, and it has hence been concluded by some that Martha was the wife or widow of Simon. The anointing described in Lk 7 36-50 happened in the house of Simon a Pharisee. But in none of the synoptist accounts is Martha mentioned. For the relationship of these anointings with each other, see MARY, IV. As, according to St. John, the abode of the sisters was in Bethany, a further difficulty of a topographical nature is raised by those who hold that St. Luke implies, from the Galilean setting of Lk 10 38-41, that the sisters lived in Galilee. But the information supplied by St. Luke, upon which this inference is based, is of the vaguest (cf Lk 10 38), and the great division of St. Luke's Gospel (9 51-18 31) has within it no organic cohesion of parts. In it is mentioned that on two separate occasions Jesus passed through Samaria (Lk 9 52; 17 11). It is therefore more logical to suppose that the events described in Lk 10 38-41, falling within the intervening period, took place in Bethany during an excursion of Jesus to Judaea, and formed one of the several visits upon which the friendship recorded in Jn 11 3.5 was built. According to a fragment of a Coptic gospel belonging to the 2d cent. (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 38, 39), Martha was present with the other two Marys at the empty grave of Jesus (cf Mt 28 1.11), and went and informed the disciples.

MARTYR, mär'tēr (μαρτύρ, martús, Aelic μαρτύρ, martúr): One who gives heed, and so, a "witness," so tr<sup>d</sup> in numerous passages, both as of one bearing testimony, and also as of one who is a spectator of anything (see WITNESS). In AV rendered "martyr" in Acts 22 20, "thy martyr Stephen"; and Rev 2 13, "Antipas my faithful martyr"; also 17 6, "the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," where alone ARV retains "martyrs." These 3 passages are the beginning of the use of the word "martyr" for such witnesses as were faithful even unto death, its uniform modern use.

MARVEL, mār'vel, MARVELOUS, mār'vel-us (מַרְבִּיל, tāmāh, מְבָרָךְ, pālā; θαυμάζω, thaumázō, θαυμαστός, thaumastós): "To marvel" is the tr of tāmāh, "to wonder" (Gen 43 33; Ps 48 5, RV "were amazed"; Eccl 5 8); of thaumázō, "to admire," "wonder" (Mt 8 10, 27; Mk 5 20; Jn 3 7; Acts 2 7; Rev 17 4 AV, etc.); "marvel" (subst.) occurs in the pl. as tr of pālā, "to distinguish," fig., "to make wonderful" (Ex 34 10, "I will do marvels, such as have not been wrought" [RVm "created"]); and of thaumastos (thaūma) (2 Cor 11 14).

"Marvelous" is the tr of pālā, "marvelous works" (1 Ch 16 12, 24; Ps 9 1); "marvelous things" (Job 5 9; 10 16; Ps 31 21; 118 23; Isa 29 14; Dan 11 36; Zec 8 6, bis); "marvellously" pālā (Job 37 5; Hab 1 5 bis [tāmāh], "regard and wonder marvellously," lit. "marvel marvellously"); thaumastos, "admirable," "wonderful," is tr "marvelous" (Mt 21 42; 1 Pet 2 9; Rev 15 1, 3, etc.).

In Apoc we have "marvel" (Eccl 11 13; 47 17; 2 Macc 1 22; 7 12); "marvelling" (Eccl 40 7; 43 18); "marvellous" (Wisd 10 17; 19 8, etc., mostly thaumazō and compounds).

RV has "wonder" for "marvel" (Rev 17 7); "the marvel" for a "marvellous thing" (Jn 9 30); "marvelled" for "wondered" (Lk 8 25; 11 14); "marvelled at" for "admired" (2 Thess 1 10); "marveling" for "wondered" (Lk 9 43); "marvellous" for "wondrous" (1 Ch 16 9; Ps 105 2); "marvellous things" for "and wonders" (Job 9 10); "wonderful" for "marvellous" (Ps 139 14); for "marvelled" (Mt 9 8), "were afraid," and (Mk 12 17) "marvelled greatly" (different texts).

I. Definition and Questions of Identification.—A Heb fem. proper name of two persons in the OT (see Ex 15 20; Nu 12 1; Mic 6 4; 1 Ch 4 17) and of a number not certainly determined in the NT. The prevalence of the name in NT times has been attributed, with no great amount of certainty, to the popularity of Mariamne, the last representative of the Hasmonean family, who was the second wife of Herod I.

(1) The name Mary occurs in 51 passages of the NT to which the following group of articles is confined (see MIRIAM). Collating all

The Name these references we have the following
Mary in apparent notes of identification: (a) the NT Mary, the mother of Jesus; (b) Mary Magdalene; (c) Mary, the mother of James; (d) Mary, the mother of Jesus; (e) Mary, the wife of Clopas; (f) Mary of Bethany; (g) Mary, the mother of Mark; (h) Mary of Rome; (i) the "other" Mary.

(2) A comparison of Mt 27 56; 28 1 with Mk 15 47 seems clearly to identify the "other" Mary with Mary the mother of Jesus.

(3) Mk 15 40 identifies Mary the mother of James and Mary the mother of Jesus (cf 15 47) (see Allen's note on Mt 27 56).

(4) At this point a special problem of identification arises. Mary, the wife of Clopas, is mentioned as being present at the cross with Mary the mother of Jesus, the latter's sister and Mary of Magdala (Jn 19 25). In the other notices of the group at the cross, Mary, the mother of James, is mentioned (Mt 27 56; Mk 15 40). Elsewhere, James is regularly designated "son of Alphaeus" (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 15). Since it can hardly be doubted that James, the apostle, and James the Less, the son of Mary, are one and the same person, the conclusion seems inevitable that Mary, the mother of James, is also the wife of Alphaeus. Here we might stop and leave the wife of Clopas unidentified, but the fact that the name Alphaeus (Ἀλφαῖος, Alphaios) is the Gr transliteration of the Aram. ܠܗܦܝ, halpay, together with the unlikelihood that anyone important enough to be mentioned by John would be omitted by the synoptists and that another Mary, in addition to the three definitely mentioned, could be present and not be mentioned, points to the conclusion that the wife of Clopas is the same person as the wife of Alphaeus (see ALPHAEUS). Along with this reasonable conclusion has grown, as an excrescence, another for which there is no basis whatever; viz. that the wife of Clopas was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. This would make the apostle James the cousin of Jesus, and, by an extension of the idea, would identify James, the apostle, with James, the "Lord's brother." The available evidence is clearly against both these inferences (see Mt 13 55; Mk 6 3; Gal 1 19).

(5) One other possible identification is offered for our consideration. Zahn, in an exceedingly interesting note (NT, II, 514), identifies Mary of Rome (Rom 16 6) with the "other" Mary of Mt. We need not enter into a discussion of the point thus raised, since the identification of a woman of whom we have no details given is of little more than academic interest.

We are left free, however, by the probabilities of the case to confine our attention to the principal individuals who bear the name of Mary. We shall discuss Mary, the mother of Jesus; Mary of Magdala; Mary of Bethany; Mary, the mother of James and Jesus; Mary, the mother of Mark.

II. Mary, the Virgin.—The biography of the mother of Jesus is gathered about a brief series of episodes which serve to exhibit her leading characteristics in clear light. Two causes have operated to distort and make unreal the very clear and vivid image of Mary left for us in the Gospels. Roman Catholic dogmatic and sentimental exaggeration has well-nigh removed Mary from history (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). On the other hand, reaction and overemphasis upon certain features of the Gospel narrative have led some to credit Mary with a negative attitude toward Our Lord and His claims, which she assuredly never occupied. It is very important that we should follow the narrative with unprejudiced eyes and give due weight to each successive episode.

Mary appears in the following passages: the Infancy narratives, Mt 1 and 2; Lk 1 and 2; the wedding at Cana of Galilee, Jn 2 1-11; the episode of Mt 12 46; Mk 3 21, 31 ff; the incident at the cross, Jn 19 25 ff; the scene in the upper chamber, Acts 1 14.

(1) It is to be noted, first of all, that Mary and her experiences form the narrative core of both Infancy documents. This is contrary to the ordinary opinion, but is unquestionably true. She is obviously the object of special interest to Luke (see Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 76 f), and there are not wanting indications that Luke's story came from Mary herself. But, while Matthew's account does not exhibit his interest in Mary quite so readily, that he was interested in the pathetic story of the Lord's mother is evident.

Luke tells the story of Mary's inward and deeply personal experiences, her call (1 26 f), her maidenly fears (1 29.35), her loyal submission (1 38), her outburst of sacred and unselfish joy (1 39-55). From this anticipatory narrative he passes at once to the Messianic fulfilment.

Matthew tells the story of the outward and, so to say, public experiences of Mary which follow hard upon the former and are in such dramatic contrast with them: the shame and suspicion which fell upon her (1 18); her bitter humiliation (1 19), her ultimate vindication (1 20f). Here the two narratives supplement each other by furnishing different details but, as in other instances, converge upon the central fact—the central fact here being Mary herself, her character, her thoughts, her experiences. The point to be emphasized above all others is that we have real biography, although in fragments; in that the same person appears in the inimitable reality of actual characterization, in both parts of the story. This is sufficient guaranty of historicity; for no two imaginary portraits ever agreed unless one copied the other—which is evidently not the case here. More than this, the story is a truly human narrative in which the remarkable character of the events which took place in her life only serves to bring into sharper relief the simple, humble, natural qualities of the subject of them.

(2) One can hardly fail to be impressed, in studying Mary's character, with her quietness of spirit; her meditative inwardness of disposition; her admirable self-control; her devout and gracious gift of sacred silence. The canticle (Lk 1 46-55), which at least expresses Luke's conception of her nature, indicates that she is not accustomed to dwell much upon herself (4 lines only call particular attention to herself), and that her mind is saturated with the spirit and phraseology of the OT. The intensely Jewish quality of her piety thus expressed accounts for much that appears anomalous in her subsequent career as depicted in the Gospels.

The first episode which demands our attention is the wedding at Cana of Galilee (Jn 2 1-11).

2. Mary at Cana The relationship between Jesus and His mother has almost eclipsed other interests in the chapter. It is to be noted that the idea of wanton interference on the part of Mary and of sharp rebuke on the part of Jesus is to be decisively rejected. The key to the meaning of this episode is to be found in 4 simple items: (1) in a crisis of need, Mary turns naturally to Jesus as to the one from whom help is to be expected; (2) she is entirely undisturbed by His reply, whatever its meaning may be; (3) she prepares the way for the miracle by her authoritative directions to the servants; (4) Jesus does actually relieve the situation by an exercise of power. Whether she turned to Jesus with distinctly Messianic expectation, or whether Jesus intended to convey a mild rebuke for her eagerness, it is not necessary for us to inquire, as it is not possible for us to determine. It is enough that her spontaneous appeal to her Son did not result in disappointment, since, in response to her suggestion or, at least, in harmony with it, He "manifested his glory." The incident confirms the Infancy narrative in which Mary's quiet and forceful personality is exhibited.

In Mt 12 46 (|| Mk 3 31-35), we are told that, when His mother and His brethren came seeking Him, Jesus in the well-known remark concerning His true relatives in the kingdom of heaven intended to convey a severe rebuke to His own household for an action which involved both unbelief and presumptuous interference in His great life-work. The explanation of this

3. Mary and the Career of Jesus incident, which involves no such painful implications as have become connected with it in the popular mind, is to be found in Mark's account. He interrupts his narrative of the arrival of the relatives (which begins in ver 21) by the account of the accusation made by the scribes from Jerus that the power of Jesus over demons was due to Beelzebub. This goes a long way toward explaining the anxiety felt by the relatives of Jesus, since the ungoverned enthusiasm of the multitude, which gave Him no chance to rest and seemed to threaten His health, was matched, contrariwise, by the bitter, malignant opposition of the authorities, who would believe any malicious absurdity rather than that His power came from God. The vital point is that the attempt of Mary and her household to get possession of the person of Jesus, in order to induce Him to go into retirement for a time, was not due to captious and interfering unbelief, but to loving anxiety. The words of Jesus have the undoubted ring of conscious authority and express the determination of one who wills the control of his own life—but it is a serious mistake to read into them any faintest accent of satire. It has been well said (Horace Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, 30) that Jesus would scarcely make use of the family symbolism to designate the sacred relationships of the kingdom of heaven, while, at the same time, He was depreciating the value and importance of the very relationships which formed the basis of His analogy. The real atmosphere of the incident is very different from this.

To be sure that many have misinterpreted the above incident we need only turn to the exquisitely tender scene at the cross recorded by 4. Mary at the Cross John (19 25 ff). This scene, equally beautiful whether one considers the relationship which it discloses as existing between Jesus and His mother, or between Jesus and His well-beloved disciple, removes all possible ambiguity which might attach to the preceding incidents, and reveals the true spirit of the Master's home. Jesus could never have spoken as He did from the cross unless He had consistently maintained the position and performed the duties of an eldest son. The tone and quality of the scene could never have been what it is had there not been a steadfast tie of tender love and mutual understanding between Jesus and His mother. Jesus could hand over His sacred charge to the trustworthy keeping of another, because He had faithfully maintained it Himself.

The final passage which we need to consider (Acts 1 14) is esp. important, because in it we discover

5. Mary in the Christian Community Mary and her household at home in the midst of the Christian community, engaged with them in prayer. It is also clear that Mary herself and the family, who seemed to be very completely under her influence, whatever may have been their earlier misgivings, never broke with the circle of disciples, and persistently kept within the range of experiences which led at last to full-orbed Christian faith. This makes it sufficiently evident, on the one hand, that the household never shared the feelings of the official class among the Jews; and, on the other, that the family of Jesus passed through the same cycle of experiences which punctuated the careers of the whole body of disciples on the way to faith. The bearing of this simple but significant fact upon the historical trustworthiness of the body of incidents just passed in review is evident.

The sum of the matter concerning Mary seems to be this: The mother of Jesus was a typical Jewish believer of the best sort. She was a deeply meditative, but by no means a daring or original thinker. Her inherited Messianic beliefs did not and perhaps could not prepare her for the method of Jesus which involved so much that was new and unexpected. But her heart was true, and from the beginning to the day of Pentecost, she pondered in her heart the meaning of her many puzzling experiences until the light came. The story of her life and of her relationship to Jesus is consistent throughout and touched with manifold unconscious traits of truth. Such a narrative could not have been feigned or fabled.

(1) Legend.—The ecclesiastical treatment of Mary consists largely of legend and dogma, about equally fictitious and unreliable. The legendary accounts, which include the apocryphal gospels, deal, for the most part, with details of her parentage and early life; her betrothal and marriage to Joseph; her journey to Bethlehem and the birth of her child. At this point the legendary narratives, in their coarse wonder-mongering and indelicate intimacy of detail, are in striking contrast to the chaste reserve of the canonical story, and of evidential value on that account.

6. Mary in Ecclesiastical Doctrine and Tradition

(2) Dogma.—There is, in addition, a full-grown legend concerning Mary's later life in the house of John; of her death in which the apostles were miraculously allowed to participate; her bodily translation to heaven; her reception at the hands of Jesus and her glorification in heaven. In this latter series of statements, we have already made the transition from legend to dogma. It is quite clear, from the statements of Roman Catholic writers themselves, that no reliable historical data are to be found among these legendary accounts. The general attitude of modern writers is exhibited in the following sentences (from Wilhelm and Scannel, Manual of Catholic Theol., II, 220, quoted by Mayor, HDB, II, 288, n.): "Mary's corporeal assumption into heaven is so thoroughly implied in the notion of her personality as given by Bible and dogma, that the church can dispense with strict historical evidence of the fact." If that is the way one feels, there is very little to say about it. Aside from the quasi-historical dogma of Mary's bodily assumption, the Roman Catholic doctrinal interpretation of her person falls into three parts.

(a) The dogma of her sinlessness: This is discussed under IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (q.v.) and need not detain us here.

(b) The dogma of Mary's perpetual virginity: It is evident that this, too, is a doctrine of such a nature that its advocates might, with advantage to their argument, have abstained from the appearance of critical discussion. Even if all the probabilities of exegesis are violated and the cumulative evidence that Mary had other children done away with; if the expression, "brethren of the Lord" is explained as "foster-brethren," "cousins" or "what-not; if Jesus is shown to be not only "first-born" but "only-born" Son (Lk 2 7); if the expression of Mt 1 25 is interpreted as meaning "up to and beyond" (Pusey et al.; cf Roman Catholic Dict., 604), it would still be as far as possible from a demonstration of the dogma. That a married woman has no children is no proof of virginity—perpetual or otherwise. That this thought has entered the minds of Roman Catholic apologists although not openly expressed by them, is evidenced by the fact that while certain forms of dealing with the "brethren-of-the-Lord" question make these the sons of Joseph by a former marriage, the favorite doctrine includes the perpetual virginity of Joseph. Just as the idea of the sinlessness of Mary has led to the dogma of the immaculate conception, so the idea of her perpetual virginity demands the ancillary notion of Joseph's. No critical or historical considerations are of any possible use here. It is a matter of dogmatic assumption un-mixed with any alloy of factual evidence, and might better be openly made such.

It is evident that a very serious moral issue is raised here. The question is not whether virginity is a higher form of life than marriage. One might be prepared to say that under certain circumstances it is. The point at issue here is very different. If Mary was married to Joseph and Joseph to Mary in appearance only, then they were recreant to each other and to the ordinance of God which made them one. How a Roman Catholic, to whom marriage is a sacrament, can entertain such a notion is an unfathomable mystery. The fact that Mary was miraculously the mother of the Messiah has nothing to do with the question of her privilege and obligation in the holiest of human relationships. Back of this unwholesome dogma are two utterly false ideas: that the marriage relationship is incompatible with holy living, and that Mary is not to be considered a human being under the ordinary obligations of human life.

(c) The doctrine of Mary's glorification as the object of worship and her function as intercessor: With no wish to be polemic toward Roman Catholicism, and, on the contrary, with every desire to be sympathetic, it is very difficult to be patient with the puerilities which disfigure the writings of Roman Catholic dogmatists in the discussion of this group of doctrines.

(i) Take, for example, the crude literalism involved in the identification of the woman of Rev 12 1-6 with Mary. Careful exegesis of the passage (esp. ver 6), in connection with the context, makes it clear that no hint of Mary's status in heaven is intended. As a matter of fact, Mary, in any literal sense, is not referred to at all. Mary's motherhood along with that of the mother of Moses is very likely the basis of the figure, but the woman of the vision is the church, which is, at once, the mother and the body of her Lord (see Milligan, Expositors' Bible, "Revelation," 196 f.).

Three other arguments are most frequently used to justify the place accorded to Mary in the liturgy.

(ii) Christ's perpetual humanity leads to His perpetual Sonship to Mary. This argument, if it carries any weight at all, in this connection, implies that the glorified Lord Jesus is still subject to His mother. It is, however, clear from the Gospels that the subjection to His parents which continued after the incident in the Temple (Lk 2 51) was gently but firmly laid aside at the outset of the public ministry (see above, II, 2, 3). In all that pertains to His heavenly office, as Lord, Mary's position is one of dependence, not of authority.

(iii) Christ hears her prayers. Here, again, dogmatic assumption is in evidence. That He hears her prayers, even if true in a very special sense, does not, in the least, imply that prayers are to be addressed to her or that she is an intercessor through whom prayers may be addressed to Him.

(iv) Since Mary cared for the body of Christ when He was on earth, naturally His spiritual body would be her special care in heaven. But, on any reasonable hypothesis, Mary was, is, and must remain, a part of that body (see Acts 1 14). Unless she is intrinsically a Divine being, her care for the church cannot involve her universal presence in it and her accessibility to the prayers of her fellow-believers.

To a non-Romanist, the most suggestive fact in the whole controversy is that the statements of cautious apologists in support of the ecclesiastical attitude toward Mary, do not, in the least degree, justify the tone of extravagant adulation which marks the non-polemical devotional literature of the subject (see Dearden, Modern Romanism Examined, 22 f.).

(3) Conclusion.—Our conclusion on the whole question is that the lit. of Mariolatry belongs, historically, to unauthorized speculation; and, psychologically, to the natural history of asceticism and clerical celibacy.

III. Mary Magdalene (Μαρία Μαγδαληνή, María Magdalēnē = of "Magdala").—A devoted follower of Jesus who entered the circle of the taught during the Galilean ministry and became prominent during the last days. The noun "Magdala," from which the adjective "Magdalene" is formed, does not occur in the Gospels (the word in Mt 15 39, is, of course, "Magadan"). The meaning of this obscure reference is well summarized in the following quotations from Plummer (ICC, "Luke," 215): "Magdala is only the Gr form of mighdāl or watch-tower, one of the many places of the name in Pal' (Tristram, Bible Places, 260); and is probably represented by the squalid group of hovels which now bears the name of Mejdal near the center of the western shore of the lake."

As she was the first to bear witness to the resurrection of Jesus, it is important that we should get a correct view of her position and character.

1. Mary not acter. The idea that she was a penitent Sinner, drawn from the life of the street, Woman of Lk 7 undoubtedly arose, in the first instance, from a misconception of the nature of her malady, together with an altogether impossible identification of her with the woman who was a sinner of the preceding section of the Gospel. It is not to be forgotten that the malady demon-possession, according to NT ideas (see DEMON, DEMONOLOGY), had none of the implications of evil temper and malignant disposition popularly associated with "having a devil."

The possessed was, by Our Lord and the disciples, looked upon as diseased, the victim of an alien and evil power, not an accomplice of it. Had this always been understood and kept in mind, the unfortunate identification of Mary with the career of public prostitution would have been much less easy.

According to NT usage, in such cases the name would have been withheld (cf Lk 7 37; Jn 8 3). At the same time the statement that 7 demons had been cast out of Mary means either that the malady was of exceptional severity, possibly involving several relapses (cf Lk 11 26), or that the mode of her divided and haunted consciousness (cf Mk 5 9) suggested the use of the number 7. Even so, she was a healed invalid, not a rescued social derelict.

The identification of Mary with the sinful woman is, of course, impossible for one who follows carefully the course of the narrative with an eye to the transitions. The woman of ch 7 is carefully covered with the concealing cloak of namelessness. Undoubtedly known by name to the intimate circle of first disciples, it is extremely doubtful whether she was so known to Luke. Her history is definitely closed at ver 50.

The name of Mary is found at the beginning of a totally new section of the Gospel (see Plummer's analysis, op. cit., xxxvii), where the name of Mary is introduced with a single mark of identification, apart from her former residence, which points away from the preceding narrative and is incompatible with it. If the preceding account of the anointing were Mary's introduction into the circle of Christ's followers, she could not be identified by the phrase of Lk. Jesus did not cast a demon out of the sinful woman of ch 7, and Mary of Magdala is not represented as having anointed the Lord's feet. The two statements cannot be fitted together.

Mary has been misrepresented in another way, scarcely less serious. She was one of the very first witnesses to the resurrection, and her testimony is of sufficient importance to make it worth while for those who antagonize the narrative to discredit her testimony. This is done, on the basis of her mysterious malady, by making her a paranoiac who was in the habit of "seeing things." Renan is the chief offender in this particular, but others have followed his example.

(1) To begin with, it is to be remarked that Mary had been cured of her malady in such a marked way that, henceforth, throughout her life, she was a monument to the healing power of Christ. What He had done for her became almost a part of her name along with the name of her village. It is not to be supposed that a cure so signal would leave her a nervous wreck, weak of will, wavering in judgment, the victim of hysterical tremors and involuntary hallucinations.

(2) There is more than this a priori consideration against such an interpretation of Mary. She was the first at the tomb (Mt 28 1; Mk 16 1; Lk 24 10). But she was also the last at the cross—she and her companions (Mt 27 61; Mk 15 40). A glance at the whole brief narrative of her life in the Gospels will interpret this combination of statements. Mary first appears near the beginning of the narrative of the Galilean ministry as one of a group consisting of "many" (Lk 8 3), among them Joanna, wife of Chuzas, Herod's steward, who followed with the Twelve and ministered to them of their substance. Mary then disappears from the text to reappear as one of the self-appointed watchers of the cross, thereafter to join the company of witnesses to the resurrection. The significance of these simple statements for the understanding of Mary's character and position among the followers of Jesus is not far to seek. She came into the circle of believers, marked out from the rest by an exceptional experience of the Lord's healing power. Henceforth, to the very end, with unwearied devotion, with intent and eager willingness, with undaunted courage even in the face of dangers which broke the courage of the chosen Twelve, she followed and served her Lord. It is impossible that such singleness of purpose, such strength of will, and, above all, such courage in danger, should have been exhibited by a weak, hysterical, neurotic incurable. The action of these women of whom Mary was one, in serving their Master's need while in life, and in administering the last rites to His body in death, is characteristic of woman at her best.

IV. Mary of Bethany.—Another devoted follower of Jesus. She was a resident of Bethany (Βηθανία, Bēthania), and a member of the family consisting of a much-beloved brother, Lazarus, and another sister, Martha, who made a home for Jesus within their own circle whenever He was in the neighborhood.

The one descriptive reference, aside from the above, connected with Mary, has caused no end of perplexity. John (11 2) states that it was this Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped His feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick. This reference would be entirely satisfied by the narrative of Jn 12 1,8, and no difficulty would be suggested, were it not for the fact that Luke (7 36-50) records an anointing of Jesus by a woman, accompanied with the wiping of His feet with her hair. The identification of these two anointings would not occasion any great difficulty, in spite of serious discrepancies as to time, place and other accessories of the action, but for the very serious fact that the woman of Lk 7 is described as a sinner in the dreadful special sense associated with that word in NT times. This is so utterly out of harmony with all that we know of Mary and the family at Bethany as to be a well-nigh intolerable hypothesis.

On the other hand, we are confronted with at least one serious difficulty in affirming two anointings. This is well stated by Mayor (HDB, III, 280a): "Is it likely that Our Lord would have uttered such a high encomium upon Mary's act if she were only following the example already set by the sinful woman of Galilee; or (taking the other view) if she herself were only repeating under more favorable circumstances the act of loving devotion for which she had already received His commendation?" We shall be compelled to face this difficulty in case we are forced to the conclusion that there were more anointings than one.

In the various attempts to solve this problem, or rather group of problems, otherwise than by holding to two anointings, Luke, who 1. Attack stands alone against Mark, Matthew upon Luke's and John, has usually suffered loss of confidence. Mayor (op. cit., 282a) suggests the possibility that the text of Luke has been tampered with, and that originally his narrative contained no reference to anointing. This is a desperate expedient which introduces more difficulties than it solves. Strauss and other hostile critics allege confusion on the part of Luke between the anointing at Bethany and the account of the woman taken in adultery, but, as Plummer well says, the narrative shows no signs of confusion. "The conduct both of Jesus and of the woman is unlike either fiction or clumsily distorted fact. His gentle severity toward Simon, and tender reception of the sinner, are as much beyond the reach of invention as the eloquence of her speechless affection" (ICC, "Luke," 209).

The first step in the solution of this difficulty is to note carefully the evidence supplied by Luke's narrative taken by itself. Mary is named for the first time in Lk 10 38-42 in a way which clearly indicates that the family of Bethany is there mentioned for the first time (a "certain [τις, tis] woman named Martha," and "she of Luke had a sister called Mary," etc). This phrasing indicates the introduction of a new group of names (cf Jn 11 1).

It is also a clear indication of the fact that Luke does not identify Mary with the sinful woman of ch 7 (cf Mt 26 6-13; Mk 14 3-9; Lk 7 36-50; Jn 12 1-8).

Our next task is to note carefully the relationship between the narratives of Mark, Matthew and John on one side, and that of Luke on the other.

3. Evidence Sifted by Comparison We may effectively analyze the narratives under the following heads: (1) notes of time and place; (2) circumstances and scenery of the incident; (3) description of the person who did the anointing; (4) complaints of her action, by whom and for what; (5) the lesson drawn from the woman's action which constitutes Our Lord's defence of it; (6) incidental features of the narrative.

Under (1) notice that all three evangelists place the incident near the close of the ministry and at Bethany. Under (2) it is important to observe that Matthew and Mark place the scene in the house of Simon "the leper," while John states vaguely that a feast was made for him by persons not named and that Martha served. Under (3) we observe that Matthew and Mark say "a woman," while John designates Mary. (4) According to Matthew, the disciples found fault; according to Mark, some of those present found fault; while according to John, the fault-finder was Judas Iscariot. According to all three, the ground or complaint is the alleged wastefulness of the action. (5) Again, according to all three, Our Lord defended the use made of the ointment by a mysterious reference to an anointing of His body for the burial. John's expression in particular is most interesting and peculiar (see Jn 12 7). (6) The Simon in whose house the incident is said to have taken place is by Matthew and Mark designated "the leper." This must mean either that he had previously been cured or that his disease had manifested itself subsequent to the feast. Of these alternatives the former is the more natural (see Gould, JCC, "Mark," 257). The presence of a healed leper on this occasion, together with the specific mention of Lazarus as a guest, would suggest that the feast was given by people, in and about Bethany, who had especial reason to be grateful to Jesus for the exercise of His healing power.

It is beyond reasonable doubt that the narratives of Matthew, Mark and John refer to the same incident. The amount of convergence and the quality of it put this identification among the practical certainties. The only discrepancies of even secondary importance are a difference of a few days in the time (Gould says four) and the detail as to the anointing of head or feet. It is conceivable, and certainly no very serious matter, that John assimilated his narrative at this point to the similar incident of Lk 7.

An analysis of the incident of Lk 7 with reference to the same points of inquiry discloses the fact that it cannot be the same as that described by the other evangelists. (1) The time and place indications, such as they are, point to Galilee and the Galilean ministry. This consideration alone is a formidable obstacle in the way of any such identification. (2) The immediate surroundings are different. Simon "the leper" and Simon "the Pharisee" can hardly be one person. No man could have borne both of these designations. In addition to this, it is difficult to believe that a Pharisee of Simon's temper would have entertained Jesus when once he had been proscribed by the authorities. Simon's attitude was a very natural one at the beginning of Christ's ministry, but the combination of hostility and questioning was necessarily a temporary mood. (3) The description of the same woman as sinner in the sense of Lk 7 in one Gospel; simply as a woman in two others; and as the beloved and honored Mary of Bethany in a third is not within the range of probability, esp. as there is no hint of an attempt at explanation on the part of any of the writers. At any rate, prima facie, this item in Luke's description is seriously at variance with the other narratives. (4) Luke is again at variance with the others, if he is supposed to refer to the same event, in the matter of the complaint and its cause. In Luke's account there is no complaint of the woman's action suggested. There is no hint that anybody thought or pretended to think that she had committed a sinful waste of precious material. The only complaint is Simon's, and that is directed against the Lord Himself, because Simon, judging by himself, surmised that Jesus did not spurn the woman because He did not know her character. This supposed fact had a bearing on the question of Our Lord's Messiahship, concerning which Simon was debating; otherwise one suspects he had little interest in the episode. This fact is, as we shall see, determinative for the understanding of the incident and puts it apart from all other similar episodes.

(5) The lesson drawn from the act by Our Lord was in each incident different. The sinful woman was commended for an act of courtesy and tenderness which expressed a love based upon gratitude for deliverance and forgiveness. Mary was commended for an act which had a mysterious and sacramental relationship to the Lord's death, near at hand.

This brings us to the point where we may consider the one serious difficulty, that alleged by Mayor and others, against the hypothesis of two anointings, namely, that a repetition of an act like this with commendation attached would not be likely to occur. The answer to this argument is that the difficulty itself is an artificial one due to a misreading of the incident. In the point of central reference the two episodes are worlds apart. The act of anointing in each case was secondary, not primary. Anointing was one of those general and prevalent acts of social courtesy which might mean much or little, this or that, and might be repeated a score of times in a year with a different meaning each time. The matter of primary importance in every such case would be the purpose and motive of the anointing. By this consideration alone we may safely discriminate between these incidents. In the former case, the motive was to express the love of a forgiven penitent. In the latter, the motive was gratitude for something quite different, a beloved brother back from the grave, and, may we not say (in view of Jn 12 7), grief and foreboding? That Mary's feeling was expressed in the same way outwardly as that of the sinful woman of the early ministry does not change the fact that the feeling was different, that the act was different and that, consequently, the commendation she received, being for a different thing, was differently expressed. The two anointings are not duplicates. Mary's act, though later, was quite as spontaneous and original as that of the sinful woman, and the praise bestowed upon her quite as natural and deserved.

With this fictitious and embarrassing identification out of the way, we are now free to consider briefly the career and estimate the

in the matter of these two sisters a most interesting and instructive point of contact between the synoptic and Johannine traditions. The underlying unity and harmony of the two are evident here as elsewhere. In Lk 10 38-42 we are afforded a view of Mary and Martha photographic in its clear revelation of them both. Martha is engaged in household affairs, while Mary is sitting at the feet of Jesus, absorbed in listening. This, of course, might mean that Mary was idle and listless, leaving the burden of responsibility for the care of guests upon her more conscientious sister. Most housewives are inclined to take this view and to think that Martha has been hardly dealt with. The story points to the contrary. It will be noticed that Mary makes no defence of herself and that the Master makes no criticism of Martha until she criticizes Mary. When He does speak, it is with the characteristic and inimitable gentleness, but in a way leaving nothing to be desired in the direction of completeness. He conveyed His love, His perfect understanding of the situation, His defence of Mary, His rebuke to Martha, in a single sentence which contains a perfect photograph of the two loved sisters. Martha is not difficult to identify. She was just one of those excellent and tiresome women whose fussy concern and bustling anxiety about the details of household management make their well-meant hospitality a burden to all their guests. Mary's quiet and restful interest in the guest and His conversation must be set against the foil of Martha's excess of concern in housework and the serving of food. When one comes to think of it, Mary chose the better part of hospitality, to put no higher construction upon her conduct. (2) In Jn 11 20, we are told that Martha went forth to meet Jesus while Mary remained in the house. In this we have no difficulty in recognizing the same contrast of outwardness and inwardness in the dispositions of the sisters; esp., as when Mary does come at Martha's call to meet Jesus, she exhibits an intensity of feeling of which Martha gives no sign. It is significant that, while Mary says just what Martha had already said (vs 21.32), her way of saying it and her manner as a whole so shakes the Lord's composure that He is unable to answer her directly but addresses His inquiry to the company in general (ver 34). (3) Then we come to the events of the next chapter. The supper is given in Bethany. Martha serves. Of course she serves. She always serves when there is opportunity. Waiting on guests, plate in hand, was the innocent delight of her life. One cannot fail to see that, in a single incidental sentence, the Martha of Lk 10 38-42 is sketched again in lifelikeness. It is the same Martha engaged in the same task. But what of Mary in this incident? She is shown in an unprecedented rôle, strange to an oriental woman and esp. to one so retiring in disposition as Mary. Her action not only thrust her into a public place alone, but brought her under outspoken criticism. But after all, this is just what we come to expect from these deep, intense, silent natures. The Mary who sat at Jesus' feet in listening silence while Martha bustled about the house, who remained at home while Martha went out to meet Him, is the very one to hurl herself at His feet in a storm and passion of tears when she does meet Him and to break out in a self-forgetful public act of devotion, strange to her modest disposition, however native to her deep emotion.

Martha was a good and useful woman. No one would deny that, least of all the Master who loved her (Jn 11 5). But she lived on the surface of things, and her affections and her piety alike found adequate and satisfying expression at all times in the ordinary kindly offices of hospitality and domestic service. Not so Mary. Her disposition was inward, silent, brooding, with a latent capacity for stress and the forthwith, unconventional expression of feelings, slowly gathering intensity through days of thought and repression. Mary would never be altogether at home in the world of affairs. Hers was a rare spirit, doomed often to loneliness and misunderstanding except at the hands of rarely discerning spirits, such as she happily met in the person of her Lord.

V. Mary, the Mother of James and Josés.—Under this caption it is necessary merely to recall and set in order the few facts concerning this Mary given in the Gospels (see Mt 27 55.56.61; Mk 15 40; 16 1; Lk 24 10; cf Lk 23 49-56).

In Mt 27 55.56 (|| Mk 15 40), we are told that at the time of the crucifixion there was a group of women observing the event from a distance. These women are said to have followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering to Him and to the disciples. Among these were Mary Magdalene (see III, above); Mary, mother of James and Josés; and the unnamed mother of Zebedee's children. By reference to Lk 8 2.3, where this group is first introduced, it appears that, as a whole, it was composed of those who had been healed of infirmities of one kind or another. Whether this description applies individually to Mary or not we cannot be sure, but it is altogether probable. At any rate, it is certain that Mary was one who persistently followed with the disciples and ministered of her substance to aid and comfort the Lord in His work for others. The course of the narrative seems to imply that Mary's sons accompanied their mother on this ministering journey and that one of them became an apostle. It is interesting to note that two mothers with their sons joined the company of the disciples and that three out of the four became members of the apostolic group. Another item in these only too fragmentary references is that this Mary, along with her of Magdala and the others of this group, was of sufficient wealth and position to be marked among the followers of Jesus as serving in this particular way. The mention of Chuzas' wife (Lk 8 3) is an indication of the unusual standing of this company of faithful women.

The other notices of Mary show her lingering late at the cross (Mk 15 40); a spectator at the burial (Mk 15 47); and among the first to bear spices to the tomb. This is the whole of this woman's biography extant, but perhaps it is enough. We are told practically nothing, directly, concerning her; but, incidentally, she is known to be generous, faithful, loving, true and brave. She came in sorrow to the tomb to anoint the body of her dead Lord; she went away in joy to proclaim Him alive forevermore. A privilege to be coveted by the greatest was thus awarded to simple faith and trusting love.

VI. Mary, the Mother of John Mark.—This woman is mentioned but once in the NT (Acts 12 12), but in a connection to arouse intense interest. Since she was the mother of Mark, she was also, in all probability, the aunt of Barnabas. The aunt of one member and the mother of another of the earliest apostolic group is a woman of importance. The statement in Acts, so far as it concerns Mary, is brief but suggestive. Professor Ramsay (see St. Paul the Traveller, etc, 385) holds that the authority for this narrative was not Peter but Mark, the son of the house. This, if true, adds interest to the story as we have it. In the first place, the fact that Peter went thither directly upon his escape from prison argues that Mary's house was a well-known center of Christian life and worship. The additional fact that coming unannounced and casually the apostle found a considerable body of believers assembled points in the same direction. That "many" were gathered in the house at the same time indicates that the house was of considerable size. It also appears that Rhoda was only one of the maids, arguing a household of more than ordinary size. There is a tradition of doubtful authenticity, that Mary's house was the scene of a still more sacred gathering in the upper room on the night of the betrayal. We conclude that Mary was a wealthy widow of Jerus, who, upon becoming a disciple of Christ, with her son, gave herself with whole-souled devotion to Christian service, making her large and well-appointed house a place of meeting for the proscribed and homeless Christian communion whose benefactor and patron she thus became.

MASCHIL, mas'kil. See PSALMS.

MASH (מָשׁ, mash): Named in Gen 10 23 as one of the sons of Aram. In the || passage in 1 Ch 1 17 the name is given as "Meshech" (meshekh), and the LXX (Mosoch) supports this form in both passages. "Meshech," however, is a Japhetic name (Gen 10 2), and "Mash" would seem to be the original reading. It is probably to be identified with the Mons Masius of classical writers (Strabo, etc), on the northern boundary of Mesopotamia.

MASHAL, mā'shal (מָשָׁל, māshāl, 1 Ch 6 74). See MISHAL.

MASIAS, ma-si'as (A, Maśias, Masias, B, Meśasias, Meisaias): The head of one of the families of Solomon's servants (1 Esd 5 34); it has no equivalent in the || Ezr 2 55 ff; RVm "Misaias."

MASMAN, mas'man. See MAASMAS.

MASON, mā's'n: The tr of 4 Heb words: (1) חָרַשׁ אֶבֶן, hārash 'ebhen, "graver of stone" (2 S 5 11); (2) (3) גָּדָהר, gādhār (2 K 12 12), חָרַשׁ קִיר, hārash kīr (1 Ch 14 1), "maker of a wall [or hedge]"; (4) חֲצַב, hāḡabh, "a hewer or digger [of stones]" (1 Ch 22 2; Ezr 3 7). Lebanon still supplies the greater number of skilled masons to Pal and Syria (see 2 S 5 11), those of Shweir being in special repute. MASREKAH, mas'rē-ka, mas-rē'ka (מִסְרֵקָה, masrēkāh; Μασρέκα, Masrēka): A place mentioned in the list of ancient rulers of Edom (Gen 36 31), "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel." Masrekah was the royal city of Samlah, son of Hadad (ver 36; 1 Ch 1 47). The name may mean "place of choice vines," but there is nothing to show in what locality it was to be sought.

MASSA, mas'a (מַסָּא, massā, "burden"): Descendant of Abraham through Ishmael (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30). His people may be the Masani of Ptolemy, having Eastern Arabia near Babylon as their habitat. The marginal reading of the heading to Prov 31 mentions Lemuel as king of Massa. If that reading is accepted, it would seem that a tribe and probably a place were named from Ishmael's descendant. The reading is doubtful, however, for where the phrase recurs in Prov 30 1 (RV) it appears to be a gloss.

MASSACRE, mas'a-kēr, OF THE INNOCENTS. See INNOCENTS, MASSACRE OF.

MASSAH AND MERIBAH, mas'a, mer'i-bā (מַסָּה וּמְרִיבָה, maṣṣāh umrībāh, "proving and strife"; πειρασμός καὶ λοιδόρησις, peirasμός kai loidōrēsis): These names occur together as applied to one place only in Ex 17 7; they stand, however, in parallelism in Dt 33 8; Ps 95 8. In all other cases they are kept distinct, as belonging to two separate narratives. The conjunction here may be due to conflation of the sources. Of course, it is not impossible that, for the reason stated, the double name was given, although elsewhere (Dt 6 16; 9 22) the place is referred to as Massah.

This scene is laid in Ex 17 1 at REPHIDIM (q.v.) and in ver 6 at HOREB (q.v.). It is near the beginning of the desert wanderings. In

1. First Instance dearth of water the people murmur and complain. Moses, appealing to God, is told what to do. He takes with him the elders of Israel, and smites with his rod the rock on which the Lord stands in Horeb, whereupon water gushes forth, and the people drink. Here Moses alone is God's agent. There is no hint of blame attaching to him. He called the place Massah and Meribah, because of the striving of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord (ver 7). In some way not indicated, here and at Meribah, God put the Levites to proof (Dt 33 8).

The second narrative describes what took place at Kadesh (i.e. "Kadesh-barnea") when the desert wanderings were nearly over (Nu 20 1-13). The flow of water from the famous spring for some reason had ceased. In their distress the people became impatient and petulant. At the door of the tent of meeting Moses and Aaron received the Lord's instructions. In his speech of remonstrance to the people Moses seemed to glorify himself and his brother; and instead of speaking to the rock as God had commanded, he struck it twice with his rod. The flow of water was at once restored; but Moses and Aaron were heavily punished because they did not sanctify God in the eyes of the children of Israel. The "Waters of Meribah" was the name given to this scene of strife. The incident is referred to in Nu 20 24, and Dt 32 51 (mēribhath kādhēsh, AV "Meribah-Kadesh," RV "Meribah of Kadesh"). In Ps 81 7 God appears as having tested Israel here. The sin of Israel and the ensuing calamity to Moses are alluded to in Ps 106 32.

The place appears in Ezk 47 19; 48 28, as on the southern border of the land of Israel, in the former as "Meriboth-kadesh," in the latter as "Meribath-kadesh" (Meriboth=pl. Meribath="const. sing.") where the position indicated is that of Ain Kadis, "Kadesh-barnea."

In Dt 33 2, by a slight emendation of the text we might read mēribhōth kādhēsh for mēribhōth kōdhēsh. This gives a preferable sense.

MASSIAS, ma-sī'as (A, Μασσίας, Massias, B, Ἀσσελας, Asselas): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 22) = "Maaseiah" of Ezr 10 22.

We have it also tr'd "masters of assemblies" (Eccl 12 11). See ASSEMBLIES, MASTERS OF. Cf Ecclus 32 1, "master [of a feast]," RV "ruler"; Jn 2 9, "ruler of the feast"; rabbī (Dnl 1 3; Jon 1 6, "shipmaster"); rabbī, Aram., "great," "mighty," "elder" (Dnl 4 9; 5 11, "master of the magicians"); also sar, "head" or "chief" (Ex 1 11, "taskmasters"; 1 Ch 15 27, "master of the song," RVm "the carrying of the ark, Heb the lifting up"); ūr, "to call," "to awake," is also rendered "master" in AV, "The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, the master and the scholar," m "him that waketh and him that answereth," RV as AVm (Mal 2 12). The vb. "to master" does not occur in the OT, but we have in Apoc (Wisd 12 18) "mastering thy power" (despōzōn ischūs), RV "being sovereign over [thy] strength."

In the NT despōtēs answers to ādōn as "master" (1 Tim 6 1.2; 2 Tim 2 21), rendered also "Lord" (Lk 2 29, etc); kúrios, is "Master," "Lord," "Sir," used very frequently of God or of Christ (Mt 1 20.22.24), tr'd "Master" (Mt 6 24; 15 27; AV Mk 13 35; Rom 14 4, etc); kathēgētēs, a "leader," is tr'd "Master" (Mt 23 8[AV.10]); didaskalos, a title very often applied to Our Lord in the Gospels, is "Teacher," tr'd "Master" in AV Mt 8 19; 9 11; Mk 4 38; Lk 3 12, etc; RV "Teacher"; also Jn 3 2.10; Jas 3 1, "be not many masters," RV "teachers"; rhabbī, rhabbēi ("Rabbi") (a transliterated Heb term signifying "my Teacher") is also in several instances applied to Jesus, AV "Master" (Mt 26 25.49; Mk 9 5; 11 21; Jn 9 2 [RV leaves untranslated]; Mk 10 51, "Rabboni," AV "Lord"; Jn 20 16 ["Rabbouni"], RV "Rabboni," q.v.).

For "master" RV has "lord" (1 S 26 16; 29 4.10; Am 4 1; Mk 13 35; Rom 14 4); "master" for "lord" (Gen 39 16; 2 Pet 2 1; Rev 6 10); for "good man of the house" (Mt 24 43; Lk 12 39); "master of the house"; in Eph 6 5, RVm gives "Gr lords" (in ver 9, "their Master and yours" is also Gr kuriōs); instead of "the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ" (Jude ver 4), RV reads "our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ," m "the only Master, and our Lord Jesus Christ"; for "overcame them" (Acts 19 16), "mastered both of them."

MASTIC, MASTICK, mas'tik (σχινός, schinos): A tree mentioned only in Sus ver 54 (cf Gen 37 25 m). It is the Pistacia lentiscus (Arab. Mistaki), a shrub which attains a height of 10 to 12 ft., growing in thickets on the slopes round the Mediterranean. The gum which exudes through incisions made in the bark is greatly prized as a masticatory. The smell and flavor are suggestive of the terbinth. It is chewed in order to preserve the teeth and gums. But often men chew it without any special purpose, just because they like it. The mastic produced in Chios is most highly esteemed. It is employed in making perfumes and sweetmeats; in preparing bread a little is sometimes added to the dough just before it is put into the oven. W. EWING

MATTAN, mat'an (מַטָּן, matlān, "a gift"):

(1) A priest in the house of Baal, slain by Jehoiada before Baal's altar (2 K 11 18; 2 Ch 23 17).

(2) The father of Shephatiah a contemporary and persecutor of Jeremiah (Jer 38 1), one of those who put Jeremiah into Malechiah's dungeon (ver 6).

MATTANAH, mat'a-na (מַטָּנָה, matlānāh; B, Μαθανάελιν, Manthanaein; A, Μαθανάελιν, Manthanein): A station of the Israelites which seems to have lain between Beer and Nahaliel (Nu 21 18 f). The name means "gift," and might not inappropriately be applied to a well in the wilderness (Budde translates "Out of the desert a gift"; see Expos T, VI, 482). Some would therefore identify it with Beer. This is improbable. There is now no clue to the place, but it must have lain S.W. of the Dead Sea.

MATTANIAH, mat-a-ni'a (מַטַּנְיָהוּ, matlanyāhū, "gift of Jeh"):

(1) King Zedekiah's original name, but changed by Nebuchadnezzar when he made him king over Judah instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 K 24 17).

(2) A descendant of Asaph (1 Ch 9 15), leader of the temple choir (Neh 11 17; 12 8). Mentioned among the "porters," keepers of "the storehouses of the gates" (12 25), and again in ver 35 as among the "priests' sons with trumpets."

(3) May be the same as (2), though in 2 Ch 20 14 he is mentioned as an ancestor of that Jahaziel whose inspired words in the midst of the congregation encouraged Jehoshaphat to withstand the invasion of Moab, Ammon and Seir (vs 14 ff).

(4-7) Four others who had foreign wives, (a) the Matthanias of 1 Esd 9 27 (Ezr 10 26); (b) the Othonias of 1 Esd 9 28 (Ezr 10 27); (c) the Matthanias of 1 Esd 9 31 (Ezr 10 30); (d) the fourth of these in 1 Esd 9 34 AV has had his name blended into that of Mattenai, and the two appear as the composite name Mamnitaneus (Ezr 10 37). He is a son of Bani.

(8) A Levite, father of Zaccur, ancestor of Hanan the under-treasurer of the Levitical offerings under Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).

(9) One of the sons of Heman the singer, whose office it was to blow the horns in the temple-service as David had appointed it (1 Ch 25 4.5). He was head of the 9th division of the 12 Levites (1 Ch 25 16), who were proficient in the Songs of Jeh (1 Ch 25 7).

(10) One of the sons of Asaph who helped Hezekiah in the fulfilling of his vow to cleanse the house of the Lord (2 Ch 29 13). HENRY WALLACE

MATTATHA, mat'a-tha (Ματθαθά, Mattathá): Son of Nathan the son of David in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 31).

MATTATHAH, mat'a-tha: RV MATTATTAH (q.v.).

MATTATHIAS, mat-a-thi'as (Ματθαθίας, Matthathias). The persons of this name in the Apoc are: (1) Mattathias the father of the Maccabees. See ASMONAENS; MACCABEES.

(2) One of the 7 who stood on Ezra's right hand as he read the law (1 Esd 9 43) = "Mattithiah" of Neh 8 4.

(3) The son—probably the youngest (cf 1 Macc 16 2)—of Simon the Maccabean, treacherously murdered along with his father and his brother Judas by his brother-in-law Ptolemy, son of Abubus in the stronghold of Dok near Jericho in the 177th Seleucid—136-135 BC (1 Macc 16 14).

(4) Son of Absalom, one of the two "captains of the forces" who in the campaign against Demetrius in the plain of Hazor gallantly supported Judas, enabling the latter to turn an impending defeat into a great victory (1 Macc 11 70).

(5) One of the three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas in 161 BC (2 Macc 14 19). No names of envoys are given in the account of 1 Macc 7 27 ff.

(6) One of the sons of Asom who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 33)=AV "Matthias"="Mattattah" of Ezr 10 33.

In addition to these two of this name are mentioned in the NT:

(7) Lk 3 25, "son of Amos."

(8) Lk 3 26, "son of Semein." S. ANGUS

MATTATTAH, mat'a-ta (מַטַּתָּה, matattāh): RV for "Mattathah" in AV (Ezr 10 33). The same as "Mattathias" of 1 Esd 9 33, AV "Matthias" (q.v.).

MATTENAI, mat-ē-nā'i, mat-ē-nī (מַטֵּנַי, mat-enay, "liberal"):

(1) (2) Two who married foreign wives, one a son of Hashum (Ezr 10 33; in 1 Esd 9 33 "Altaneus"); the other a son of Bani (Ezr 10 37).

(3) A priest in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua (Neh 12 19), representing the house of Joiarib.

MATTER, mat'ēr: This word being a very general term may express various ideas. RV therefore frequently changes the reading of AV in order to state more definitely the meaning of the context (cf Ex 24 14; 1 S 16 18; 1 K 8 59; 2 S 11 19; Est 3 4; Ps 35 20; 64 5; Prov 16 20; 18 13). דָּבָר, dābhār, and the Gr λόγος, lógos, both meaning "word," are very frequently tr'd by "matter." ὕλη, hūlē, "wood," is rendered "matter" in Jas 3 5 AV (RV "how much wood is kindled"; cf Sir 28 10). Job 32 18 tr's lit. "words"; also Dnl 4 17, "sentence." διαφέρω, diaphērō, "to carry in different places," "to differ," is rendered "to make matter" (Gal 2 6). The meaning is "it makes a difference," "it matters," "it is of importance."

MATTATHAN, mat'than (Ματθαῖον, Matthān, WH Μαθθαῖον, Maththān): An ancestor of Jesus, grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1 15). See MATTHAT.

MATTHANIAS, mat-tha-ni'as (A, Ματθαῖος, Matthanias, B, Ματάν, Matān):

(1) One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 27)="Mattaniah" of Ezr 10 26.

(2) AV "Matthanias" (1 Esd 9 31)="Mattaniah" of Ezr 10 30. B, followed by Swete, reads Βεσπασμῶς, Beskaspsmūs.

MATTHAT, mat'that (Ματθαῖ, Matthāt, Μαθθαῖ, Maththāt): The name of two ancestors of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3 24,29), one being the grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary.

MATTHEW, math'ū: Matthew the apostle and evangelist is mentioned in the 4 catalogues of the apostles in Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13, though his place is not constant in this list, varying between the 7th and the 8th places and thus exchanging positions with Thomas. The name occurring in the two forms Ματθαῖος, Matthaios, and Μαθθαῖος, Maththaios, is a Gr reproduction of the Aram. Mattathyāh, i.e. "gift of Jeh," and equivalent to Theodore. Before his call to the apostolic office, according to Mt 9 9, his name was Levi. The identity of Matthew and Levi is practically beyond all doubt, as is evident from the predicate in Mt 10 3; and from a comparison of Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27 with Mt 9 9. St. Mark calls him "the son of Alphaeus" (Mk 2 14), although this cannot have been the Alphaeus who was the father of James the Less; for if this James and Matthew had been brothers this fact would doubtless have been mentioned, as is the case with Peter and Andrew, and also with the sons of Zebedee. Whether Jesus, as

He did in the case of several others of His disciples, gave him the additional name of Matthew is a matter of which we are not informed. As he was a customs officer (ὁ τελώνης, ho telōnēs, Mt 10 3) in Capernaum, in the territory of Herod Antipas, Matthew was not exactly a Rom official, but was in the service of the tetrarch of Galilee, or possibly a subordinate officer, belonging to the class called portitores, serving under the publicani, or superior officials who farmed the Rom taxes. As such he must have had some education, and doubtless in addition to the native Aram. must have been acquainted with the Gr. His ready acceptance of the call of Jesus shows that he must have belonged to that group of publicans and sinners, who in Galilee and elsewhere looked longingly to Jesus (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34; 15 1). Just at what period of Christ's ministry he was called does not appear with certainty, but evidently not at once, as on the day when he was called (Mt 9 11,14,18; Mk 5 37), Peter, James and John are already trustworthy disciples of Jesus. Unlike the first six among the apostles, Matthew did not enter the group from among the pupils of John the Baptist. These are practically all the data furnished by the NT on the person of Matthew, and what is found in post- and extra-Bib. sources is chiefly the product of imagination and in part based on mistaking the name of Matthew for Matthias (cf Zahn, Intro to the NT, ch liv, n.3). Tradition states that he preached for 15 years in Pal and that after this he went to foreign nations, the Ethiopians, Macedonians, Syrians, Persians, Parthians and Medes being mentioned. He is said to have died a natural death either in Ethiopia or in Macedonia. The stories of the Roman Catholic church that he died the death of a martyr on September 21 and of the Gr church that this occurred on November 10 are without any historical basis. Clem. Alex. (Strom., iv.9) gives the explicit denial of Heracleon that Matthew suffered martyrdom. G. H. SCHODDE

MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL OF (εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ματθαῖον, euaggēlion katā Maththaion [or Ματθαῖον, Matthaion]):

1. Name of Gospel—Unity and Integrity
2. Canoncity and Authorship
3. Relation of Gr and Aram. Gospels
4. Contents, Character and Purpose
5. Problems of Literary Relation
6. Date of Gospel

LITERATURE

The "Gospel according to Matthew," i.e. the Gospel according to the account of Matthew, stands, according to traditional, but not entirely universal, arrangement, first among the canonical Gospels. The Unity and Gospel, as will be seen below, was unanimously ascribed by the testimony of the ancient church to the apostle Matthew, though the title does not of itself necessarily imply immediate authorship. The unity and integrity of the Gospel were never in ancient times called in question. Chs 1, 2, particularly—the story of the virgin birth and childhood of Jesus—are proved by the consentient testimony of MSS, VSS, and patristic references, to have been an integral part of the Gospel from the beginning (see VIRGIN BIRTH). The omission of this section from the heretical Gospel of the Ebionites, which appears to have had some relation to our Gospel, is without significance.

The theory of successive redactions of Mt, starting with an Aram. Gospel, elaborated by Eichhorn and Marsh (1801), and the related theories of successive editions of the Gospel put forth by the Tübingen school (Baur, Hilgenfeld, Köstlin, etc.), and by Ewald (Bleek supposes a primitive Gr Gospel), lack historical foundation, and are refuted by the fact that MSS and VSS know only the ultimate redaction. Is it credible that the churches should quietly accept redaction after redaction, and not a word be said, or a vestige remain, of any of them?

(1) Canonicity.—The apostolic origin and canonical rank of the Gospel of Mt were accepted without a doubt by the early church. Origen, in the beginning of the 3d cent. could speak of it as the first of "the four Authorship Gospels, which alone are received without dispute by the church of God under heaven" (in Euseb., HE, VI, 25). The use of the Gospel can be traced in the apostolic Fathers; most distinctly in Barnabas, who quotes Mt 22 14 with the formula, "It is written" (5). Though not mentioned by name, it was a chief source from which Justin took his data for the life and words of Jesus (cf Westcott, Canon, 91 ff), and apostolic origin is implied in its forming part of "the Memoirs of the Apostles," "which are called Gospels," read weekly in the assemblies of the Christians (Ap. i.66, etc). Its identity with our Mt is confirmed by the undoubted presence of that Gospel in the Diatessaron of Tatian, Justin's disciple. The testimony of Papias is considered below. The unhesitating acceptance of the Gospel is further decisively shown by the testimonies and use made of it in the works of Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and by its inclusion in the Muratorian Canon, the Itala, Pesh, etc. See CANON of NT; GOSPELS.

(2) Authorship.—The questions that cluster around the First Gospel have largely to do with the much-discussed and variously disputed statement concerning it found in Eusebius (HE, III, 39), cited from the much older work of Papias, entitled Interpretation of the Words of the Lord. Papias is the first who mentions Matthew by name as the author of the Gospel. His words are: "Matthew composed the Logia [λόγια, logia, "words," "oracles"] in the Heb [Aram.] tongue, and everyone interpreted them as he was able." Papias cannot here be referring to a book of Matthew in which only the discourses or sayings of Jesus had been preserved, but which had not any, or only meager accounts of His deeds, which imaginary document is in so many critical circles regarded as the basis of the present Gospel, for Papias himself uses the expression τὰ λόγια, τὰ λόγια, as embracing the story, as he himself says, in speaking of Mk, "of the things said or done by Christ" (Euseb., HE, III, 24; cf particularly T. Zahn, Intro to NT, sec. 54, and Lightfoot, Supernatural Religion, 170 ff). Eusebius further reports that after Matthew had first labored among his Jewish compatriots, he went to other nations, and as a substitute for his oral preaching, left to the former a Gospel written in their own dialect (III, 24). The testimony of Papias to Matthew as the author of the First Gospel is confirmed by Irenaeus (iii.3, 1) and by Origen (in Euseb., HE, V, 10), and may be accepted as representing a uniform 2d-cent. tradition. Always, however, it is coupled with the statement that the Gospel was originally written in the Heb dialect. Hence arises the difficult question of the relation of the canonical Gr Gospel, with which alone, apparently, the fathers were acquainted, to this alleged original apostolic work.

One thing which seems certain is that whatever this Heb (Aram.) document may have been, it was not an original form from which the present Gr Gospel of Mt was tr'd, either by the apostle himself, or by somebody else, as was maintained by Bengel, Thiersch, and other scholars. Indeed, the Gr Mt throughout bears the impress of being not a tr at all, but as having been originally written in Gr, and as being less Hebraistic in the form of thought than some other NT writings, e.g.

the Apocalypse. It is generally not difficult to discover when a Gr book of this period is a tr from the Heb or Aram. That our Mt was written originally in Gr appears, among other things, from the way in which it makes use of the OT, sometimes following the LXX, sometimes going back to the Heb. Particularly instructive passages in this regard are 12 18-21 and 13 14,15, in which the rendering of the Alexandrian tr would have served the purposes of the evangelist, but he yet follows more closely the original text, although he adopts the LXX wherever this seemed to suit better than the Heb (cf Keil's Comm. on Mt, loc. cit.).

The external evidences to which appeal is made in favor of the use of an original Heb or Aram. Mt in the primitive church are more than elusive. Eusebius (HE, V, 10) mentions as a report (λέγεται, legetai) that Pantaeus, about the year 170 AD, found among the Jewish Christians, probably of South Arabia, a Gospel of Mt in Heb, left there by Bartholomew; and Jerome, while in the Syrian Beroea, had occasion to examine such a work, which he found in use among the Nazarenes, and which at first he regarded as a composition of the apostle Matthew, but afterward declared not to be such, and then identified with the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Evangelium secundum or juxta Hebraeos) also called the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, or of the Nazarenes, current among the Nazarenes and Ebionites (De Vir. Illustr., iii; Contra Pelag., iii.2; Comm. on Mt 12 13, etc; see GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS). For this reason the references by Irenaeus, Origen, Eusebius to the Heb Gospel of Mt are by many scholars regarded as referring to this Heb Gospel which the Jewish Christians employed, and which they thought to be the work of the evangelist (cf for fuller details RE, XII, art. "Matthaeus der Apostel"). Just what the original Heb Mt was to which Papias refers (assuming it to have had a real existence) must, with our present available means, remain an unsolved riddle, as also the possible connection between the Gr and Heb texts. Attempts like those of Zahn, in his Kommentar on Mt, to explain readings of the Gr text through an inaccurate understanding of the imaginary Heb original are arbitrary and unreliable. There remains, of course, the possibility that the apostle himself, or someone under his care (thus Godet), produced a Gr recension of an earlier Aram. work.

The prevailing theory at present is that the Heb Matthaean document of Papias was a collection mainly of the discourses of Jesus (called by recent critics Q), which, in variant Gr translations, was used both by the author of the Gr Mt and by the evangelist Luke, thus explaining the common features in these two gospels (W. C. Allen, however, in his Crit. and Exeget. Comm. on Mt, disputes Lk's use of this supposed common source. Intro, xlvii ff). The use of this supposed Matthaean source is thought to explain how the Gr Gospel came to be named after the apostle. It has already been remarked, however, that there is no good reason for supposing that the "Logia" of Papias was confined to discourses. See further on "sources" below.

(1) Contents and character.—As respects contents, the Gospel of Mt can be divided into 3 chief parts: (1) preliminary, including the 4. Contents, birth and early youth of the Lord Character (chs 1, 2); (2) the activity of Jesus in and Galilee (chs 3-18); (3) the activity Purpose of Jesus in Judaea and Jerus, followed by His passion, death, and resurrection (chs 19-28). In character, the Gospel, like those of the other evangelists, is only a chrestomathy, a selection from the great mass of oral tradition concerning the doings and sayings of Christ current in apostolic and early Christian circles, chosen for the special purpose which the evangelist had in view. Accordingly, there is a great deal of material in Mt in common with Mk and Lk, although not a little of this material, too, is individualistic in character, and of a nature to vex and perplex the harmonist, as e.g. Matthew's accounts of the temptation, of the demoniacs at Gadara, of the blind man at Jericho (4 1-11; 8 28-34; 20 29-34); yet there is much also in this Gospel that is peculiar to it. Such are the following pericopes: chs 1, 2; 9 27-36; 10 15. 37-40; 11 28-30; 12 11.12.15-21.33-38; 13 24-30.36-52; 14 28-31; 16 17-19; 17 24-27; 18 15-35; 19 10-12; 20 1-16; 21 10 f.14-16.28-32; 22 1-14; 23 8-22; 24 42-25 46; 27 3-10.62-66; 28 11 ff. The principle of arrangement of the material is not chronological, but rather that of similarity of material. The addresses and parables of Jesus are reported consecutively, although they may have been spoken at different times, and material scattered in the other evangelists—esp. in Lk—is found combined in Mt. Instances are seen in the Sermon on the Mount (chs 5-7), the "mission address" (ch 10), the seven parables of the Kingdom of God (ch 13), the discourses and parables (ch 18), the woes against the Pharisees (ch 23), and the grand eschatological discourses (chs 24, 25) (cf with || in the other gospels, on the relation to which, see below).

(2) Purpose.—The special purpose which the writer had in view in his Gospel is nowhere expressly stated, as is done, e.g., by the writer of the Fourth Gospel in Jn 20 30.31, concerning his book, but it can readily be gleaned from the general contents of the book, as also from specific passages. The traditional view that Matthew wrote primarily to prove that in Jesus of Nazareth is to be found the fulfilment and realization of the Messianic predictions of the OT prophets and seers is beyond a doubt correct. The mere fact that there are about 40 proof passages in Mt from the OT, in connection even with the minor details of Christ's career, such as His return from Egypt (2 15), is ample evidence of this fact, although the proof manner and proof value of some of these passages are exegetical cruxes, as indeed is the whole way in which the OT is cited in the NT (see QUOTATIONS, NT).

The question as to whether the Gospel was written for Jewish Christians, or for Jews not yet converted, is less important, as this book, as was the case probably with the Ep. of Jas, was written at that transition period when the Jewish and the Christian communions were not yet fully separated, and still worshipped together.

Particular indications as to this purpose of the Gospel are met with at the beginning and throughout the whole work; e.g. it is obvious in 1 1, where the proof is furnished that Jesus was the son of Abraham, in whom all families of the earth were to be blessed (Gen 12 3), and of David, who was to establish the kingdom of God forever (2 S 7). The genealogy of Lk, on the other hand (3 23 ff), with its cosmopolitan character and purpose, aiming to show that Jesus was the Redeemer of the whole world, leads back this line to Adam, the common ancestor of all mankind. Further, as the genealogy of Mt is evidently that of Joseph, the foster and legal father of Jesus, and not that of Mary, as is the case in Lk, the purpose to meet the demands of the Jewish reader is transparent. The full account in Mt of the Sermon on the Mount, which does not, as is sometimes said, contain a "new program of the kingdom of God"—indeed does not contain the fundamental principles of the Gospel at all—but is the deeper and truly Bib. interpretation of the Law over against the superficial interpretation of the current Pharisaism, which led the advocates of the latter in all honesty to declare, "What lack I yet?" given with the design of driving the auditors to the gospel of grace and faith proclaimed by Christ (cf Gal 3 24)—all this is only intelligible when we remember that the book was written for Jewish readers. Again the γέγραπται, gégraptai—i.e. the fulfilment of OT Scripture, a matter which for the Jew was everything, but for the Gentile was of little concern—appears in Mt on all hands. We have it e.g. in connection with the birth of Jesus from a virgin, His protection from Herod, His coming to Nazareth (1 22 f; 2 5.6.15.17 f.23), the activity of John the Baptist (3 3; cf 11 10), the selection of Galilee as the scene of Jesus' operations (4 14 ff), the work of Jesus as the fulfilment of the Law and Prophets (5 17), His quiet, undemonstrative methods (12 17 ff), His teaching by parables (13 35), His entrance into Jerus (21 4 f.16), His being arrested (26 54), the betrayal of Judas (27 9), the distribution of His garments (27 35). Throughout, as Professor Kübel says, the Gospel of Mt shows a "diametrical contrast between Christ and Pharisaism." Over against the false Messianic ideas and ideals of contemporary teachings among the Jews, Mt selects those facts from the teachings and deeds of Christ which show the true Messiah and the correct principles of the kingdom of God. In this respect the Gospel can be regarded as both apologetic and polemical in its aim, in harmony with which also is its vivid portraiture to the growing hostility of the Jews to Christ and to His teachings which, in the latter part of Mt, appears as intense as it does in John. Nowhere else do we find such pronounced denunciations of the Pharisees and their system from the lips of Jesus (cf 9 11 ff; 12 1 ff; 15 1 ff; 16 1 ff; and on particular points 5 20 ff; 9 13; 23 23; see also 8 12; 9 34; 12 24; 21 43). It is from this point of view, as representing the antithesis to the narrow Pharisaic views, that we are to understand the writer's emphasis on the universality of the kingdom of Jesus Christ (cf 3 1-12; 8 10-12; 21 33-44; 28 18-20)—passages in which some have thought they discerned a contradiction to the prevailing Jewish strain of the Gospel.

The special importance of the Gospel of Mt for the synoptic problem can be fully discussed only in the art. on this subject (see GOSPELS, THE SYNOPTIC), and in connection with Mk and Lk. The Relation of the synoptic problem deals primarily with the literary relations existing between the first 3 Gospels. The contents of these are in many cases so similar, even in verbal details, that they must have some sources in common, or some dependence or interdependence must exist between them; on the other hand, each of the 3 Gospels shows so many differences and dissimilarities from the other two, that in their composition some independent source or sources—oral or written—must have been employed. In general it may be said that the problem itself is of little more than literary importance, having by no means the historical significance for the development of the religion of the NT which the Pentateuchal problem has for that of the OT. Nor has the synoptic problem any historical background that promises a solution as the Pentateuchal problem has in the history of Israel. Nothing save an analysis of the contents of these Gospels, and a comparison of the contents of the three, offers the scholar any material for the study of the problem, and as subjective taste and impressions are prime factors in dealing with materials of this sort, it is more than improbable, in the absence of any objective evidence, that the synoptic problem in general, or the question of the sources of Mt in particular, will ever be solved to the satisfaction of the majority of scholars. The hypothesis which at present has widest acceptance is the "two-source" theory, according to which Mk, in its existing or some earlier form, and the problematical original Mt (Q), constitute the basis of our canonical Gospel.

In proof of this, it is pointed out that nearly the whole of the narrative-matter of Mk is taken up into Mt, as also into Lk, while the large sections, chiefly discourses, common to Mt and Lk are held, as already said, to point to a source of that character which both used. The difficulties arise when the comparison is pursued into details, and explanation is sought of the variations in phraseology, order, sometimes in conception, in the respective gospels.

Despite the prestige which this theory has attained, the true solution is probably a simpler one. Matthew no doubt secured the bulk of his data from his own experience and from oral tradition, and as the former existed in fixed forms, due to catechetical instruction, in the early church, it is possible to explain the similarities of Mt with the other two synoptics on this ground alone, without resorting to any literary dependence, either of Mt on the other two, or of these, or either of them, on Mt. The whole problem is purely speculative and subjective and under present conditions justifies a cui bono? as far as the vast literature which it has called into existence is concerned.

According to early and practically universal tradition Mt wrote his Gospel before the other three, and the place assigned to it in NT literature favors the acceptance of this tradition. Irenaeus reports that it was written when Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome (iii.1), and Euseb. states that this was done when Matthew left Pal and went to preach to others (III, 24). Clement of Alexandria is responsible for the statement that the presbyters who succeeded each other from the beginning declared that "the gospels containing the genealogies [Mt and Lk] were written first" (Euseb., HE, VI, 14). This is, of course, fatal to the current theory of dependence on Mk, and is in consequence rejected. At any rate, there is the best reason for holding that the book must have been written before the destruction of Jerus in 70 AD (cf 24 15). The most likely date for the Gr Gospel is in the 7th Christian decade. Zahn claims that Matthew wrote his Aram. Gospel in Pal in 62 AD, while the Gr Mt dates from 85 AD, but this latter date is not probable.

MATTHIAS, ma-thi'as (Ματθίας, Matthias, or Μαθθίας, Matthias; מַתְתִּיָּהוּ, Matthyāh, "given of Jeh"): Matthias was the one upon whom the lot fell when he, along with Joseph Barsabbas, was put forward to fill up the place in the apostleship left vacant by Judas Iscariot (Acts 1 15-26). This election was held at Jerus, and the meeting was presided over by St. Peter. The conditions demanded of the candidates were that they should "have accompanied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto the day that he was received up from us," and that the one chosen should "become a witness with us of his resurrection" (Acts 1 21-22). The mode of procedure was by lot, and with prayer was the election made (cf Acts 1 24).

Hilgenfeld identifies Matthias with Nathanael

(cf NATHANAEL). He was traditionally the author of the "Gospel of Matthias," a heretical work referred to by Origen (Hom. on Lk, i), by Eusebius (HE, III, 25, 6) and by Hieronymus (Proem in Math.). No trace of it is left. The gnostic Basilides (c 133 AD) and his son Isidor claimed to ground their doctrine in the "Gospel of Basilides" on the teaching Matthias received directly from the Saviour (Hippol., vii.20) (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 167). Various parts of the apocryphal "Contendings of the Apostles" deal with the imprisonment and blinding of Matthias by the Ethiopian cannibals, and his rescue by Andrew (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 163, 164, 267-88; see also ANDREW). According to the Martyrdom of St. Matthias (Budge, II, 289-94) he was sent to Damascus, and died at Phalaeon, a city of Judaea. Other sources mention Jerus as the place of Matthias' ministry and burial.

MATTITHIAH, mat-i-thi'a (מַתִּיתְיָהוּ, Matthyāh, or מַתִּיתְיָהוּ, matthyāhū, "gift of Jeh"):

(1) The Mattithiah of Neh 8 4 (1st spelling) was one of those who stood at Ezra's right hand while he read the law (cf 1 Esd 9 43). He may be the individual set over "things that were baked in pans" (1 Ch 9 31).

(2) One of those appointed by David to minister before the ark, and to "celebrate and to thank and praise Jeh, the God of Israel" (1 Ch 16 4 5).

(3) One of those who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 43). In 1 Esd 9 35, "Mazitias."

(4) One of the Levites who ministered before the ark with harps (1 Ch 15 18 21; 25 3 21, 2d spelling).

MATTOCK, mat'ok: The tr of 3 Heb words: (1) מַחֲרֶשֶׁת, maḥārēshāh, probably "a pickaxe" (1 S 13 20 21; cf ver 21 m); (2) הֶרֶבֶב, herēbh, "sword," "ax," "tool" (2 Ch 34 6 AV, "with their mattocks," AVm "mauls," RV "in their ruins," RVm "with their axes"); (3) מַעְדֵּר, ma'dēr, "hoe," "rake," "chopping instrument" (Isa 7 25). Vines were usually grown on terraces on the hills of Pal, and then the mattock was in constant use. The usual mattock is a pick with one end broad, the other pointed.

MAUL, mōl (מַעֲרִץ, mēphīz, lit. "a breaker," "a club," "mace," "mattock"): A smashing weapon like the oriental war-club or the clubs always carried by the shepherds of Lebanon (Prov 25 18; cf Jer 51 20 m).

MAUZZIM, moz'em, mots'em (מְצֻצִים, mā'uz-zim, "places of strength," "fortresses"): Many conjectures as to the meaning of this word and its context (Dnl 11 38; cf vs 19 39) have been made. The LXX (uncertainly), Theodotion, and the Geneva Version render it as a proper name. Theodoret adopted Theodotion's reading and explained it as "Antichrist"! Grotius thought it a corruption of Ἀΐζος, Āizōs, the Phoen war-god, while Calvin saw in it the "god of wealth"! Perhaps the buzz of conjectures about the phrase is owing to the fact that in the first passage cited the word is preceded by Ἐλσῆh, meaning God. The context of the passage seems clearly to make the words refer to Antiochus Epiphanes, and on this account some have thought that the god Mars—whose figure appears on a coin of Antiochus—is here referred to. All this is, however, little better than guesswork, and the RV tr, by setting the mind upon the general idea that the monarch referred to would trust in mere force, gives us, at any rate, the general sense; though it does not exclude the possibility of a reference to a particular deity. In vs 19 and 39, the word "Mauzzim" is simply tr<sup>d</sup> "fortresses," and the idea conveyed is that the mental obsession of fortresses is equivalent to deifying them. A conjecture of Layard's (Nineveh, II, 456, n.), is, at any rate, worth referring to. HENRY WALLACE

MAW, mō (קֶבֶה, kēbhāh [cf קֶבֶה, kēbhāh, Nu 25 8], כֶּרֶס, k'rēs; LXX ἐνυστρον, ēnustron): The first word means the maw or stomach of ruminants. It is derived from a root designating "hollowed out." It is mentioned alongside of the shoulder and the two cheeks of ox and sheep, which are the priest's share of any sacrifice brought by Israelites (Dt 18 3). LXX, where ēnustron corresponds to Attic ἔνυστρον, ēnustron, denotes the fourth stomach or abomasum, which was considered as a delicacy, and was almost a national dish of the Athenians, just as tripe is of the Londoners. The parallel form kēbhāh is used for the body of a woman, which is being transfixed by a spear thrust in Nu 25 8. The last word k'rēs is found in a metaphorical sense: "[Nebuchadnezzar] hath, like a monster, swallowed me up, he hath filled his maw with my delicacies" (Jer 51 34). H. L. E. LUERING

MAZITIAS, maz-i-tī'as (A, Μαζίτιας, Mazittas, B, Ζετίτιας, Zeittias): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 35), identical with Mattithiah (Ezr 10 43).

MAZZALOTH, maz'a-loth (The Planets). See ASTROLOGY, 9.

MAZZAROTH, maz'a-roth: The 12 constellations of the Zodiac. See ASTRONOMY, II, 12.

MAZZEBAH, maz-ē'ba, mats-ē'ba. See PILLAR.

MEADOW, med'ō: (1) מְדִינָה, 'ārōth, "the meadows [AV "paper reeds"] by the Nile" (Isa 19 7); מְדִינָה גִבְעָה, ma'ārēh-gābha', AV "meadows of Gibeah," RV "Maareh-geba," RVM "the meadow of Geba, or Gibeah" (Jgs 20 33); from מְדָה, 'ārāh, "to be naked"; cf Arab. عَرِي, ariya,

"to be naked," عَرَاء, 'ara'ā, "a bare tract of land." 'Ārōth and ma'ārēh signify tracts bare of trees. (2) מְדִינָה, 'āhū, in Pharaoh's dream of the kine, AV "meadow," RV "reed grass" (Gen 41 2,18). 'Āhū is found also in Job 8 11, AV and RV "flag," RVM "reed-grass." According to Gesenius, 'āhū is an Egypt word denoting the vegetation of marshy ground. (3) אֲבֵל קֶרְמִים, 'ābhēl k'rāmīm, "Abel-cheramim," RVM "The meadow of vineyards," AV "the plain [AVm "Abel"] of the vineyards" (Jgs 11 33); "Abel-beth-maacah" (1 K 15 20; 2 K 15 29; cf 2 S 20 14,15,18); "Abel-shittim" (Nu 33 49; cf 25 1; Josh 2 1; 3 1; Jgs 7 22; Joel 3 18; Mic 6 5); "Abel-meholah" (Jgs 7 22; 1 K 4 12; 19 16); "Abel-maim" (2 Ch 16 4); "Abel-mizraim" (Gen 50 11); "stone," AV "Abel," RVM "Abel," that is "a meadow" (1 S 6 18); cf Arab. أَبَل, 'abal, "green grass," and أَبَلَة, 'abalat, "unhealthy marshy ground," from وَبَلَ, wabal, "to rain." MEAH, mē'a (מֵאָה, mē'āh, "hundred"). See HAMMEAH.

MEAL, mēl (אֶכֶל, 'ōkheḥ): Denotes the portion of food eaten at any one time. It is found as a compound in Ruth 2 14, "meal-time," lit. "the time of eating." See Food.

MEAL OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

MEALS, mēlz, MEAL-TIME: Bread materials, bread-making and baking in the Orient are dealt with under BREAD (q.v.). For food-stuffs in use among the Hebrews in Bible times more specifically see Food. This article aims to be complementary, dealing esp. with the methods of preparing and serving food and times of meals among the ancient Hebrews.

The Book of Jgs gives a fair picture of the early formative period of the Heb people and their ways of living. It is a picture of semi-savagery—of the life and customs of free desert tribes. In 1 S we note a distinct step forward, but the domestic and cultural life is still low and crude. When they are settled in Pal and come in contact with the most cultured people of the day, the case is different. Most that raised these Sem invaders above the dull, crude existence of fellahin, in point of civilization, was due to the people for whom the land was named (Macalister, Hist of Civilization in Pal). From that time on various foreign influences played their several parts in modification of Heb life and customs. A sharp contrast illustrative of the primitive beginnings and the growth of luxury in Israel in the preparation and use of foods may be seen by a comparison of 2 S 17 28 f with 1 K 4 22 f.

I. Methods of Preparing Food.—The most primitive way of using the cereals was to pluck the fresh ears (Lev 23 14; 2 K 4 42), remove the husk by rubbing (cf Dt 23 25 and Mt 12 1), and eat the grain raw. A practice common to all periods, observed by fellahin today, was to parch or roast the ears and eat them unground. Later it became customary to grind the grain into flour, at first by the rudimentary method of pestle and mortar (Nu 11 8; cf Prov 27 22), later by the hand-mill (Ex 11 5; Job 31 10; cf Mt 24 41), still later in mills worked by the ass or other animal (Mt 18 6, lit. "a millstone turned by an ass"). The flour was then made into bread, with or without leaven (see LEAVEN).

Another simple way of preparing the grain was to soak it in water, or boil it slightly, and then, after drying and crushing it, to serve it as the dish called "groats" is served among western peoples.

The kneading of the dough preparatory to baking was done doubtless, as it is now in the East, by pressing it between the hands or by passing it from hand to hand; except that in Egypt, as the monuments show, it was put in "baskets" and trodden with the feet, as grapes in the wine press. (This is done in Paris bakeries to this day.) See BREAD; FOOD.

Lentils, several kinds of beans, and a profusion of vegetables, wild and cultivated, were prepared and eaten in various ways. The like beans, and flavored with onions and other ingredients, no doubt, as we find done in Syria today (cf Gen 25 29,34), and sometimes ground and made into bread (Ezk 4 9; cf ZDPV, IX, 4). The wandering Israelites in the wilderness looked back wistfully on the cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions and garlic of Egypt (Nu 11 5), and later we find all of these used for food in Pal. How many other things were prepared and used for food by them may be gathered from the Mish, our richest source of knowledge on the subject.

2. Vegetables lentils were sometimes roasted, as they are today, and eaten like "parched corn." They were sometimes stewed

The flesh of animals—permission to eat which it would seem was first given to Noah after the deluge

(Gen 1 29 f; 9 3 f)—was likewise prepared and used in various ways: (a)

3. Meat Roasting was much in vogue, indeed was probably the oldest of all methods of preparing such food. At first raw meat was laid upon hot stones from which the embers had been removed, as in the case of the "cake baked on the hot stones" (1 K 19 6 RVm; cf Hos 7 8, "a cake not turned"), and sometimes underneath with a covering of ashes. The fish that the disciples found prepared for them by the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21 9) was, in exception to this rule, cooked on the live coals themselves. A more advanced mode of roasting was by means of a spit of green wood or iron (for baking in ovens, see FOOD).

(b) Boiling was also common (see Gen 25 29; Ex 12 9, etc, ARV; EV more frequently "seething," "sod," "sodden"), as it is in the more primitive parts of Syria today. The pots in which the boiling was done were of earthenware or bronze (Lev 6 28). When the meat was boiled in more water than was required for the ordinary "stew" the result was the broth (Jgs 6 19 f), and the meat and the broth might then be served separately. The usual way, however, was to cut the meat into pieces, larger or smaller as the case might demand (1 S 2 13; Ezk 24 3 ff; cf Micah's metaphor, 3 3), and put these pieces into the cooking-pot with water sufficient only for a stew. Vegetables and rice were generally added, though crushed wheat sometimes took the place of the rice, as in the case of the "savory meat" which Rebekah prepared for her husband from the "two kids of the goats" (Gen 27 9). The seeds of certain leguminous plants were also often prepared by boiling (Gen 25 29; 2 K 4 38). (c) The Heb housewives, we may be sure, were in such matters in no way behind their modern kinswomen of the desert, of whom Doughty tells: "The Arab housewives make savory messes of any grain, seething it and putting thereto only a little salt and samn [clarified butter]."

Olive oil was extensively and variously used by the ancient Hebrews, as by most eastern peoples then, as it is now. (a) Oriental cooking poses of butter and lard among ourselves. (b) Oil was used in cooking vegetables as we use bacon and other animal fats, and in cooking fish and eggs, as also in the finer sorts of baking. See BREAD; FOOD; OIL. (c) They even mixed oil with the flour, shaped it into cakes and then baked it (Lev 2 4). The "little oil" of the poor widow of Zerephath was clearly not intended for the lamps, but to bake her pitiful "handful of meal" (1 K 17 12). (d) Again the cake of unmixed flour might be baked till almost done, then smeared with oil, sprinkled with anise seed, and brought by further baking to a glossy brown. A species of thin flat cakes of this kind are "the wafers anointed with oil" of Ex 29 2, etc. (e) Oil and honey constituted, as now in the East, a mixture used as we use butter and honey, and are found also mixed in the making of sweet cakes (Ezk 16 13,19). The taste of the manna is said in Ex 16 31 to be like that of "wafers made with honey," and in Nu 11 8 to be like "the taste of cakes baked with oil" (RVm).

II. Meals, Meal-Time, etc.—(1) It was customary among the ancient Hebrews, as among their contemporaries in the East in classical lands, to have but two meals a day. The "morning morsel" or "early snack," as it is called in the Talm, taken with some relish like olives, oil or melted butter, might be used by peasants, fishermen, or even artisans, to "break their fast" (see the one reference to it in the NT in Jn 21 12,15), but this was not a true meal. It was rather ἀριστον πρωϊνόν, áriston prōínón (Robinson, BRP, II, 18), though some think it the ἀριστον, áriston, of the NT (Eldersheim, LITJ, II, 205, n. 3; cf Plummer, ICC, on Lk 11 37). To "eat a meal," i.e. a full meal, in the morning was a matter for grave reproach (Eccl 10 16), as early drinking was unusual and a sign of degradation (cf Acts 2 15).

(2) The first meal (cf "meal-time," lit. "the time of eating," Ruth 2 14; Gen 43 16), according to general usage, was taken at or about noon when the climate and immemorial custom demanded a rest from labor. Peter's intended meal at Joppa, interrupted by the messengers of Cornelius, was at "the sixth hour," i.e. 12 M. It corresponded somewhat to our modern "luncheon," but the hour varied according to rank and occupation (Shabbāth 10a). The Bedawi take it about 9 or 10 o'clock (Burckhardt, Notes, I, 69). It is described somewhat fully by Lane in Modern Egyptians. To abstain from this meal was accounted "fasting" (Jgs 20 26; 1 S 14 24). Drummond (Tropical Africa) says his Negro bearers began the day's work without food.

(3) The second and main meal (NT, δείπνον, deîpnon) was taken about the set of sun, or a little before or after, when the day's work was over and the laborers had "come in from the field" (Lk 17 7; 24 29 f). This is the "supper time," the "great supper" of Lk 14 16, the important meal of the day, when the whole family were together for the evening (Burkhardt, Notes, I, 69). It was the time of the feeding of the multitudes by Jesus (Mk 6 35; Mt 14 15; Lk 9 12), of the eating of the Passover, and of the partaking of the Lord's Supper. According to Jewish law, and for special reasons, the chief meal was at midday—"at the sixth hour," according to Jos (Vita, 54; cf Gen 43 16-25; 2 S 24 15 LXX). It was Jeh's promise to Israel that they should have "bread" in the morning and "flesh" in the evening (Ex 16 12), incidental evidence of one way in which the evening meal differed from that at noon. At this family meal ordinarily there was but one common dish for all, into which all "dipped the sop" (see Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20), so that when the food, cooked in this common stew, was set before the household, the member of the household who had prepared it had no further work to do, a fact which helps to explain Jesus' words to Martha, 'One dish alone is needful' (Lk 10 42; Hastings DCG, s.v. "Meals").

(4) Sabbath banqueting became quite customary among the Jews (see examples cited by Lightfoot, Hor. Heb et Talm on Lk 14 1; cf Edersheim, LTJM, II, 52, 437; Farrar, Life of Christ, II, 119, n.). Indeed it was carried to such an excess that it became proverbial for luxury. But the principle which lay at the root of the custom was the honor of the Sabbath (Lightfoot, op. cit., III, 149), which may explain Jesus' countenance and use of the custom (cf Lk 7 36; 11 37; 14 7-14), and the fact that on the last Sabbath He spent on earth before His passion He was the chief guest at such a festive meal (Jn 12 2). It is certain that He made use of such occasions to teach lessons of charity and religion, in one case even when His host was inclined to indulge in discourteous criticism (Lk 7 39; 11 38 45 f; cf Jn 12 7 f). He seems to have withheld His formal disapproval of what might be wrong in tendency in such feasts because of the latent possibilities for good He saw in them, and so often used them wisely and well. It was on one of these occasions that a fellow-guest in his enthusiasm broke out in the exclamation, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God" (Lk 14 15), referring evidently to the popular Jewish idea that the Messianic kingdom was to be ushered in with a banquet, and that feasting was to be a chief part of its glories (cf Isa 25 6; Lk 13 29). See BANQUET.

III. Customs at Meals.—In the earliest times the Hebrews took their meals sitting, or more probably squatting, on the ground like the Bedawi and fellahin of today (see Gen 37 25, etc), with the legs gathered tailor-fashion (PEFS, 1905, 124). The use of seats naturally followed upon the change from nomadic to agricultural life, after the conquest of Canaan. Saul and his messmates sat upon "seats" (1 S 20 25), as did Solomon and his court (1 K 10 5; cf 13 20, etc). With the growth of wealth and luxury under the monarchy, the custom of reclining at meals gradually became the fashion. In Amos' day it was regarded as an aristocratic innovation (Am 3 12; 6 4), but two centuries later Ezekiel speaks of "a stately bed" or "couch" (cf Est 1 6 RV) with "a table prepared before it" (Ezk 23 41), as if it was no novelty. By the end of the 3d cent. BC it was apparently universal, except among the very poor (Jth 12 15; Tob 2 1). Accordingly, "sitting at meat" in the NT (EV) is everywhere replaced by "reclining" (RVm), though women and children still sat. They leaned on the left elbow (Sir 41 19), eating with the right hand (see LORD'S SUPPER). The various words used in the Gospels to denote the bodily attitude at meals, as well as the circumstances described, all imply that the Syrian custom of reclining on a couch, followed by Greeks and Romans, was in vogue (Edersheim, II, 207). Luke uses one word for it which occurs nowhere else in the NT (κατακλιθῆναι, kataklithēnai, 7 36; 14 8; 24 30; and κατακλινεῖν, kataklinein, 9 14 15), which Hobart says is the medical term for laying patients or causing them to lie in bed (Medical Language of Luke, 69). For costumes and customs at more elaborate feasts see BANQUET; DRESS. For details in the "minor morals" of the dinner table, see the classical passages (Sir 31 12-18; 32 3-12),

MEAN, mēn: The noun "meaning" (Dnl 8 15 AV, RV "I sought to understand"; and 1 Cor 14 11) is synonymous with "signification," but in 1 Macc 15 4 AV it expresses "purpose" (RV "I am minded to land"). The noun "mean" in Heb always occurs in the pl., and is generally used in the sense of "agency," "instrument" (cf 1 K 10 29, etc). RV very frequently changes AV: Wisd 8 13, "because of her"; 2 Thess 2 3, "in any wise"; Lk 8 36, "how"; Prov 6 26, "on account of"; Rev 13 14, "by reason of" (cf also 2 Thess 3 16; Jn 9 21). He 9 15 (AV "that by means of death") tr<sup>a</sup> lit. "that a death having taken place," from γίνομαι, ginomai, "to become," "to happen." Acts 18 21 AV, "I must by all means keep this feast," is omitted in RV in harmony with several cursives, the Vulg, and some other VSS.

The adj. "mean" is used in the sense of "common," "humble" (אָדָם, ādām, "man"; cf Isa 2 9; 5 15; 31 8 omits "mean"). It is also used in the sense of "obscure" (Prov 22 29, הַשְׁחֹכְהָ, hāshōkh, "obscure"; ἀσμος, āsēmos, lit. "without a mark," "unknown," Acts 21 39). "Mean" is found in expressions like "in the meanwhile" (AV 1 K 18 45, RV "little while"; Jn 4 31; Rom 2 15, RV "one with another"); "in the mean time" (1 Macc 11 41 AV; Lk 12 1); and "in the mean season" AV (1 Macc 11 14; 15 15). The advb. "meanly" is found (2 Macc 15 38) in the sense of "moderately."

The vb. "mean" expresses purpose (Isa 3 15; 10 7; Gen 50 20, etc.). In some cases RV renders lit. tr: Acts 27 2, "was about to sail" (AV "meaning to sail"); cf Acts 21 13; 2 Cor 8 13. In other instances the idea of "to mean" is "to signify," "to denote" (1 S 4 6; Gen 21 29; Mt 9 13, etc.). Lk 15 26 tr lit. "what these things might be." In Ex 12 26 the sense of "mean ye" is "to have in mind."

MEANI, mē-ā'ni: AV=RV "Maani" (1 Esd 5 31).

MEARAH, mē-ā'ra (מֵעָרָה, m'ārāh; omitted in LXX): A town or district mentioned only in Josh 13 4, as belonging to the Zidonians. The name as it stands means "cave." If that is correct it may be represented by the modern village Mogheiriyeh, "little cave," not far from Sidon. Perhaps, however, we should find in the word the name of a Sidonian city, with the prep. מִן, min, that has suffered change in transcription. LXX reads "from Gaza"; but Gaza is obviously too far to the S.

MEASURE, mezh'ūr, MEASURES: Several different words in the Heb and Gr are rendered by "measure" in EV. In Job 11 9 and Jer 13 25 it stands for מֶדֶד, madh, מִידָה, middāh, and it is the usual rendering of the vb. מָדַד, mādhadh, "to measure," i.e. "stretch out," "extend," "spread." It is often used to render the words representing particular measures, such as ephah (Dt 25 14.15; Prov 20 10; Mic 6 10); or kor (1 K 4 22; 5 11 [5 2 and 5 25 Heb text]; 2 Ch 2 10 [Heb text 2 9]; 27 5; Ezr 7 22); or seah (Gen 18 6; 1 S 25 18; 1 K 18 32; 2 K 7 1.16.18); or βάρος, bátos, "bath" (Lk 16 6). For these terms see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. It also renders מִקְדָּה, middāh, "measure of length" (Ex 26 2); מִסְרָה, m'sūrāh, a liquid measure (Lev 19 35; 1 Ch 23 29; Ezk 4 11.16); מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt, "judgment" (Jer 30 11; 46 28); סֹאמָה, sa's'āh, a word of uncertain meaning, perhaps derived from seah (Isa 27 8); שְׁלִישׁ, shālīsh, "threefold, large measure" (Ps 80 5 [Heb text ver 6]; Isa 40 12); טֹכְהֵן, tōkhēn, and מַתְכוֹנֶת, mathkōneth, "weight" and that which is weighed, taken as measure (Ezk 45 11). In Isa 5 14 it stands for חֹק, hok, "limit." In the NT, besides being the usual rendering of the vb. μετρέω, metrēō, and of the noun μέτρον, metron, it is used for χοίτη, choitiz, a dry measure containing about a quart (Rev 6 6).

MEASURING LINE (קֵו, kaw, קֵוָה, keweh): The usual meaning is simply line, rope or cord, as in Isa 28 10.13, but the line was used for measurement, as is evident from such passages as 1 K 7 23; Job 38 5; Jer 31 39. Whether the line for measuring had a definite length or not we have no means of knowing. In Isa 44 13 it refers to the line used by the carpenter in marking the timber on which he is working, and in Zec 1 16 it refers to the builder's line.

Figuratively: It signifies destruction, or a portion of something marked off by line for destruction, as in 2 K 21 13; or for judgment, as in Isa 28 17.

H. PORTER

MEASURING REED (קֶלֶה הַמִּדָּה, kēlēh ha-middāh; κάλαμος, kálamos): Used in Ezk 40 5 ff; 42 16; 45 1; Rev 11 1; 21 15.16. The length of the reed is given as 6 cubits, each cubit being a cubit and a palm, i.e. the large cubit of 7 palms, or about 10 ft. See CUBIT. Originally it was an actual reed used for measurements of considerable length, but came at last to be used for a measure of definite length, as indicated by the reference in Ezk (cf "pole" in Eng. measures).

MEAT, mēt (βρῶμα, brōma, βρῶσις, brōsis): In AV used for food in general, e.g. "I had my meat of herbs" (2 Esd 12 51); "his disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat," RV "food" (Jn 4 8). The Eng. word signified whatever is eaten, whether of flesh or other food.

MEAT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

MEBUNNAI, mē-bun'ī, mē-bun'ā-i (מְבַנְיָי, m'bhunnay, "well-built"): One of David's "braves" (2 S 23 27). In 2 S 21 18 he is named "Sibbechai" (RV "Sibbecai"), and is there mentioned as the slayer of a Philistean giant. The RV spelling occurs in 1 Ch 11 29, the AV "Sibbechai" in 20 4 (cf 2 S 21 18); and in 1 Ch 27 11 the RV spelling recurs, where this person is mentioned as captain of the 8th course of the 12 monthly courses that served the king in rota. Scribal error, and the similarity in Heb spelling of the two forms accounts for the difference in spelling. RV consistently tries to keep this right.

HENRY WALLACE

MECHERATHITE, mē-kō'rath-it (מֵכֶרֶתִי, m'kērāthī, "dweller in Mecharah"): Possibly this is a misreading of "Maachathite" (AV). It is the description of Hopher, one of David's valiant men (1 Ch 11 36).

In the parallel list of 2 S 23, esp. ver 34, the "Maachathite" is mentioned without name in the place in the list given to Hopher in 1 Ch 11 36. The variations do not destroy the conviction that the list is virtually the same.

MECONAH, mē-kō'na (מֵכֹנָה, m'khōnāh; Μαχνά, Machná): A town apparently in the neighborhood of Ziklag, named only in Neh 11 28, as reoccupied by the men of Judah after the Captivity. It is not identified.

MEDABA, med'a-ba: The Gr form of "Medeba" in 1 Macc 9 36.

MEDAD, mē'dad (מֵדָד, mēdhād, "affectionate"): One of the 70 elders on whom the spirit of the Lord came in the days of Moses enabling them to prophesy. Medad and one other, Eldad, began to prophesy in the camp, away from the other elders who had assembled at the door of the tabernacle to hear God's message. Joshua suggested that Eldad and Medad be stopped, but Moses interceded on their behalf, saying, "Would that all Jch's people were prophets!" (Nu 11 26-29). The subject-matter of their prophecy has been variously supplied by tradition. Cf the Pal Tgs ad loc., the apocalyptic Book of Eldad and Modad, and Ba'al ha-turim (ad loc.).

ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

MEDAN, mē'dan (מֵדָן, m'dhān, "strife"): One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25 2; 1 Ch 1 32). The tribe and its place remain unidentified, and the conjecture that the name may be connected with the Midianites is unlikely from the fact that in the list of the sons of Abraham and Keturah Midian is mentioned alongside of Medan.

MEDEBA, med'-ba (מֵדְבָא, mēdh'bhā'; Μαυδαβή, Maudabē, Μηδαβή, Mēdabā'): The name may mean "gently flowing water," but the sense is doubtful. This city is first mentioned along with Heshbon and Dibon in an account of Israel's conquests (Nu 21 30). It lay in the Mishōr, the high pastoral land of Moab. The district in which the city stood is called the Mishōr or plain of Medeba in the description of the territory assigned to Reuben (Josh 13 9), or the plain by Medeba (ver 16). Here the Ammonites and their Syrian allies put the battle in array against Joab, and were signally defeated (1 Ch 19 7). This must have left the place definitely in the possession of Israel. But it must have changed hands several times. It was taken by Omri, evidently from Moab; and Mesha claims to have recovered possession of it (M S, ll. 7.8.29.30). It would naturally fall to Israel under Jeroboam II; but in Isa 15 2 it is referred to as a city of Moab. It also figures in later Jewish history. John, son of Mattathias, was captured and put to death by the Jambri, a robber tribe from Medeba. This outrage was amply avenged by Jonathan and Simon, who ambushed a marriage party of the Jambri as they were bringing a noble bride from Gabbatha, slew them all and took their ornaments (1 Macc 9 36 ff; Ant, XII, i, 2, 4). Medeba was captured by Hyrcanus "not without the greatest distress of his army" (Ant, XIII, ix, 1). It was taken by Jannaeus from the Nabataeans. Hyrcanus promised to restore it with other cities so taken to Aretas in return for help to secure him on the Judaean throne (ib, xv, 4; XIV, i, 4). Ptolemy speaks of it as a town in Arabia Petraea, between Bostra and Petra. Eusebius and Jerome knew it under its ancient name (Onom, s.v.). It became the seat of a bishopric, and is mentioned in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon (451 AD), and in other ecclesiastical lists.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Mādeba, a ruined site with an Arab village, crowning a low hill, some 6 miles S. of Heshbon, with which it was connected by a Roman road. The ruins, which are considerable, date mainly from Christian times. The surrounding walls can be traced in practically their whole circuit. There is a large tank, now dry, measuring 108 yds. x 103 yds., and about 12 ft. in depth. In 1890 it was colonized by some Christian families from Kerak, among whom the Latins carry on mission work. In December, 1893, a most interesting mosaic was found. It proved to be a map of part of Pal and Lower Egypt of the time of Justinian. Unfortunately it is much damaged. An account of it will be found in PEFS, 1897, 213 ff, 239; 1898, 85, 177 ff, 251.

MEDES, mēdz (מְדִי, mādhī; Assy Amādā, Madā; Achaem. Pers Māda; Μηδοί, Mēdoi [Gen 10 2; 2 K 17 6; 18 11; 1 Ch 1 5; Ezr 6 2; Est 1 3.14.18.19; 10 2; Isa 13 17; 21 2; Jer 25 25; 51 11.28; Dnl 5 28; 6 1.9.13.16; 8 20; 9 1; 11 1]): Mentioned as Japhethites in Gen 10 2, i.e. Aryans, and accordingly they first called themselves "Αἰοι, Aioi (Herod. vii.62), in Avestic Airya = Skt. Ārya, "noble." They were closely allied in descent, language and religion with the Persians, and in secular history preceded their appearance by some centuries. Like most Aryan nations they were at first divided into small village communities each governed by its own chiefs (called in Assy hazanāti by Assur-bani-pal: cf Herod. i.96). Shalmaneser II mentions them (Nimrod Obelisk, i.121) about 840 BC. They then inhabited the modern Ā'zarbāijān (Media Atropatene). Ram-mānu-nirārī III of Assyria (Rawlinson, WAI, I, 35) declares that he (810-781 BC) had conquered "the land of the Medes and the land of Parsua" (Persis), as well as other countries. This probably meant only a plundering expedition, as far as Media was concerned. So also Assur-nirārī II (WAI, II, 52) in 749-748 BC overran Namri in Southwest Media. Tiglath-pileser IV (in Bab called Pulu, the "Pul" of 2 K 15 19) and Sargon also overran parts of Media. Sargon in 716 BC conquered Kisheshin, Khar-khar and other parts of the country. Some of the Israelites were by him transplanted to "the cities of the Medes" (2 K 17 6; 18 11; the LXX reading 'Ορη, Orē, cannot be rendered "mountains" of the Medes here) after the fall of Samaria in 722 BC. It was perhaps owing to the need of being able to resist Assyria that about 720 BC the Medes (in part at least) united into a kingdom under Dēiokēs, according to Herodotus (i.98). Sargon mentions him by the name Dayaukku, and says that he himself captured this prince (715 BC) and conquered his territory two years later. After his release, probably, Dēiokēs fortified Ecbatana (formerly Ellippi) and made it his capital. It has been held by some that Herodotus confounds the Medes here with the Mandā (or Umman-Mandā, "hosts of the Mandā") of the inscriptions; but these were probably Aryan tribes, possibly of Scythian origin, and the names Mādā and Mandā may be, after all, identical. Esar-haddon in his 2d year (679-678 BC) and Assur-bani-pal warred with certain Median tribes, whose power was now growing formidable. They (or the Mandā) had conquered Persis and formed a great confederacy. Under Kyaxarēs (Ūvakhshatara—Dēiokēs' grandson, according to Herodotus), they besieged Nineveh, but Assur-bani-pal, with the assistance of the Ashguza (? the Ashkenaz of Gen 10 3), another Aryan tribe, repelled them. The end of the Assyrian empire came, however, in 606 BC, when the Mandā under their king Iribak-tukte, Mamiti-arsu "lord of the city of the Medes," Kassarit of the Armenian district of Kar-kassi, the Kimmerians (Gimīrrā=Gomer) under Teushpā (Tēispēs, Chaishpish), the Minni (Mannā; cf Jer 51 27), and the Babylonians under Nabu-pal-usur, stormed and destroyed Nineveh, as Nabu-nahid informs us. The last king of Assyria, Sin-shar-iskun (Sarukos), perished with his people.

Median Dress.

Herodotus says that Dēiokēs was succeeded by Phraortēs (Fravartish) his son, Phraortēs by his son Kyaxarēs; and the latter in turn left his kingdom to his son Astyagēs whose daughter Mandanē married Cambyēs, father of the great Cyrus. Yet there was no Median empire (such as he describes) then, or at least it did not embrace all the Aryan tribes of Western Asia, as we see from the inscriptions that in 606 BC, and even later, many of them were under kings and princes of their own (cf Jer 25 25; 51 11). Herodotus tells us they were divided into six tribes, of whom the Magi were one (Herod. i.101). Kyaxarēs warred for 5 years (590-585 BC) with the Lydians, the struggle being ended in May, 585, by the total eclipse of the sun foretold by Thales (Herod. i.74).

The alliance between the Medes and the Babylonians ended with Nebuchadnezzar's reign. His successor Nabu-nahid (555 BC) says that in that year the Medes under Astyages (Ishtuwegu) entered Mesopotamia and besieged Haran. Soon after, however, that dynasty was overthrown; for Cyrus the Persian, whom Nabu-nahid the first time he mentions him styles Astyages' "youthful slave" (ardušu šahru), but who was even then king of Anshan (Anzan), attacked and in 549 BC captured Astyages, plundered Ecbatana, and became king of the Medes. Though of Pers descent, Cyrus did not, apparently, begin to reign in Persia till 546 BC. Henceforth there was no Median empire distinguished from the Pers (nor is any such mentioned in Dnl, in spite of modern fancies). As the Medes were further advanced in civilization and preceded the Persians in sovereignty, the Gr historians generally called the whole nation "the Medes" long after Cyrus' time. Only much later are the Persians spoken of as the predominant partners. Hence it is a sign of early date that Daniel (8 20) speaks of "Media and Persia," whereas later the Book of Est reverses the order ("Persia and Media," Est 1 3.14.18.19; 10 2), as in the inscriptions of Darius at Behistūn.

Under Darius I, Phraortēs (Fravartish) rebelled, claiming the throne of Media as a descendant of Kyaxarēs. His cause was so powerfully supported among the Medes that the rebellion was not suppressed till after a fierce struggle. He was finally taken prisoner at Ragā (Rai, near Tehrān), brutally mutilated, and finally impaled at Ecbatana. After that Median history merges into that of Persia. The history of the Jews in Media is referred to in Dnl and Est. 1 Macc tells something of Media under the Syrian (6 56) and Parthian dominion (14 1-3; cf Jos, Ant, XX, iii). Medes are last mentioned in Acts 2 9. They are remarkable as the first leaders of the Aryan race in its struggle with the Semites for freedom and supremacy.

MEDIA, mē'di-a (מֵדִיָּה, mādhay; Achaem. Pers Māda; Μῆδια, Mēdia): Lay to the W. and S.W. of the Caspian, and extended thence to the Zagrus Mountains on the W. On the N. in later times it was bounded by the rivers Araxes and Cyrus, which separated it from Armenia. Its eastern boundaries were formed by Hyrcania and the Great Salt Desert (now called the Kavir), and it was bounded on the S. by Susiana. In earlier times its limits were somewhat indefinite. It included Atropatene (Armenian Atropatakan, the name, "Fire-guarding," showing devotion to the worship of Fire) to the N., and Media Magna to the S., the former being the present Āzarbāijān. Near the Caspian the country is low, damp and unhealthy, but inland most of it is high and mountainous, Mt. Demāvand in the Alburz range reaching 18,600 ft. Atropatene was famed for the fertility of its valleys and table-lands, except toward the N. Media Magna is high; it has fruitful tracts along the course of the streams, but suffers much from want of water, though this was doubtless more abundant in antiquity. It contained the Nisacan Plain, famous for its breed of horses. The chief cities of ancient Media were Ecbatana, Gazaea, and Ragae. The Orontes range near Ecbatana is the present Alvand. Lake Spautā is now known as Urmī (Urumiah).

V. CONCLUSION

LITERATURE

1. Introductory.—(1) "Mediation" in its broadest sense may be defined as the act of intervening between parties at variance for the purpose of reconciling them, or between parties not necessarily hostile for the purpose of leading them into an agreement or covenant. Theologically, it has reference to the method by which God and man are reconciled through the instrumentality of some intervening process, act or person, and esp. through the atoning work of Jesus Christ. The term itself does not occur in Bib. literature. (2) The term "mediator" (= middleman, agent of mediation) is nowhere found in OT or Apoc (EV), but the corresponding Gr word μεσίτης, mesitēs, occurs once in LXX (Job 9 33 AV, "Neither is there any daysman betwixt us," where "daysman" stands for Heb mōkhiš, "arbitrator," ARV, ERV umpire) [see DAYSMAN]; LXX has ὁ μεσίτης ἡμῶν, ho mesitēs hēmōn, "our mediator," as a paraphrase for Heb bēnēnū, "betwixt us"). Even in the NT, mesitēs, "mediator," occurs only 6 t, viz. Gal 3 19.20 (of Moses), and 1 Tim 2 5; He 8 6; 9 15; 12 24 (of Christ).

Though the actual terms are thus very rare, the principle of mediation is one of great significance in Bib. theology, as well as in the Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy. It cor-

2. The Principle of Mediation responds to a profound human instinct or need which finds expression in some form or other in most religions.

It is an attempt to solve the problem raised by (1) the idea of the infinite distance which separates God from man and the universe, and (2) the deeply felt want of bringing them into a harmonious relation. The conception of mediation will differ, therefore, according to whether the distance to be surmounted is understood ethically or metaphysically. If it be thought of in an ethical or religious sense, that is, if the emphasis be laid on the fact of human sin as standing in the way of man's fellowship with God, then mediation will be the mode by which peaceful relations are established between sinful man and the absolutely righteous God. But if the antithesis of God and the world be conceived of metaphysically, i.e. be based on the ultimate nature of God and of the world conceived as essentially opposed to each other, then mediation will be the mode by which the transcendent God, without Himself coming into direct contact with the world, is able to produce effects in it through an intermediate agent (or agents). The latter conception (largely the result of an exaggerated Platonic dualism) exerted an important influence on later Jewish thought, and even on Christian theology, and will come briefly under our consideration. But in the main we shall be concerned with the former view, as more in harmony with the development of Bib. theology which culminates in the NT doctrine of atonement. Mediation between God and man as presented in the Scriptures has 3 main aspects, represented respectively by the functions of the prophet, the priest, and the theocratic king. Here and there in the OT these tend to meet, as in Melchizedek the priest-king, and in the Suffering Servant of Deutero-Isa, who unites the priestly function of sacrifice with the prophetic function of revealing the Divine will. But on the whole, these aspects of mediation in the OT run along lines which have no meeting-point in one person adequate to all the demands. In the NT they intersect in the person and work of Jesus Christ, who realizes in Himself the full meaning of the prophetic, priestly, and kingly ideals.

II. Mediation in the OT.—We do not find in the OT a fixed and final doctrine of mediation universally accepted as an axiom of religious

1. Negative Teaching in the OT thought, but only a gradual movement toward such a doctrine, under the growing sense of God's exaltation and of man's frailty and sinfulness. Such a passage as 1 S 2 25 seems definitely to contradict the idea of mediation. Still more striking are the words of Job above referred to, "There is no umpire betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both," i.e. to enforce his decision (Job 9 33), where the LXX paraphrases, "Would that there were a mediator and a reprove and a hearer between us both." The note of despair which characterizes this passage shows that Job has no hope that such an arbitrator between him and God is forthcoming. Yet the words give pathetic utterance to the deep inarticulate cry of humanity for a mediator. In this connection we should note the protests of prophets and psalmists against an unethical view of mediation by animal sacrifices (Mic 6 6-8; Ps 40 6-8, etc), and their frequent direct appeals to God for mercy without reference to any mediation (Ps 25 7; 32 5; 103 8 ff, etc).

(1) Mediatory sacrifice.—In the patriarchal age, before the official priest had been differentiated from the rest of the community, the function of offering sacrifice was discharged by the head of the family or clan on behalf of his people, as by Noah (Gen 8 20), Abraham (Gen 12 7, 8; 15 9-11), Isaac (Gen 26 24 f), Jacob (Gen 31 54; 33 20). So Job, conceived by the writer as living in patriarchal antiquity, is said to have offered sacrifices vicariously for his sons (Job 1 5). Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem (Gen 14 18-20), is a figure of considerable theological interest, inasmuch as he was taken by the author of Ps 110 as the forerunner of the ideal theocratic king who was also priest, and by the author of He as prototype of Christ's priesthood.

(2) Intercessory prayer.—Intercession is in all stages of thought an essential element in mediation. We have striking examples of it in Gen 18 22-33; Job 42 8-10.

(3) The Mosaic covenant.—In Moses we have for the first time a recognized national representative who acted both as God's spokesman to the people, and the people's spokesman before God. He alone was allowed to "come near unto Jeh," and to him Jeh spake "face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Ex 33 11). He went up to God and "reported the words of the people" to Him, as to a sovereign who cannot be approached save by his duly accredited minister (Ex 19 8). We have a striking example of his intercessory mediation in the episode of the golden calf, when he pleaded effectively with God to turn from His wrath (Ex 32 12-14), and even offered to "make atonement for" (kippēr, lit. "cover") their sin by confessing their sin before God, and being willing to be blotted out of God's book, so that the people might be spared (vs 30-32). Here we have already the germs of the idea of vicarious suffering for sin.

(4) Intercessory mediation.—Samuel is by Jeremiah classed with Moses as the chief representative of intercessory mediation (Jer 15 1). He is reported as mediating by prayer between Israel and God, and succeeding in warding off the punishment of their sin (1 S 7 5-12). On such occasions, prayer was wont to be accompanied by confessions of sins and by an offering to Jeh.

Samuel represents the transition from the ancient seer or soothsayer to the prophetic order. The prophet was regarded as the organ of

3. Prophetic Mediation Divine revelation, to consult whom was equivalent to "inquiring of God" (1 S 9 9)—a commissioner sent by God (Isa 6 8 f) to proclaim His will by word and action. In that capacity he was Jeh's representative among men, and so could speak in a tone of authority. Prophetic revelation is essential to the OT religion (cf He 1 1), which by it stands distinguished from a mere philosophy or natural religion. God is not merely a passive object of human discovery, but one who actively and graciously reveals Himself to His chosen people through the medium of the authorized exponents of His mind and will. Thus in the main the prophet stands for the principle of mediation in its man-ward aspect. But the God-ward aspect is not absent, for we find the prophet mediating with God on behalf of men, making intercession for them (Jer 14 19-22; Am 7 2 f. 5 f.).

Mediation is in a peculiar sense the function of the priest. In the main he stands for the principle in its God-ward aspect. Yet in the early

4. Priestly Mediation period it was the man-ward aspect that was most apparent; i.e. the priest was at first regarded as the medium through which Jeh delivered His oracles to men, the human mouthpiece of supernatural revelation, giving advice in difficult emergencies by casting the sacred lot. Before the time of the first literary prophets, the association of the priests with the ephod and the lot had receded into the background (though the high priest theoretically retained the gift of interpreting the Divine will through the Urim and Thummim, Ex 28 30; Lev 8 8); but the power they lost with the oracle they gained at the altar. First they acquired a preferential status at the local sanctuaries; then, in the Deuteronomic legislation, where sacrifice is limited to the Jerus sanctuary, it is assumed that only Levite priests can officiate. Finally, in the Levitical system as set forth in the PC (which regulated Jewish worship in the post-exilic times), the Aaronic priests, now clearly distinguished from the Levites, have the sole privilege of immediate access to God in His sanctuary (Nu 4 19, 20; 16 3-5). God's transcendence and holiness are now so emphasized that between Him and the sin-stained people there is almost an infinite chasm. Hence the people can only enjoy its ideal right of drawing nigh unto God and offering sacrifice to Him through the mediation of the official priesthood. The mediatorship of priests derived its authority, not from their moral purity or personal worth, but from the ceremonial purity which attached to their office. All priests are not on the same level. A process of graduated sanctity narrows down their number as the approach is made to the Most Holy Place, which symbolizes the presence chamber of Jeh. (1) Out of the sacred nation as a whole, the priestly tribe of Levi is elected and invested with a special sanctity to perform all the subordinate acts of service within the tabernacle (Nu 8 19; 18 6). (2) Within this sacred tribe, the members of the house of Aaron are set apart and invested with a still higher sanctity; they alone officiate at the altar in the Holy Place and expiate the guilt of the people by sacrifice and prayer, thus representing the people before God. Yet even they are only admitted to the proximate nearness of the Holy Place. (3) The gradation of the hierarchy is completed by the recognition of a single, supreme head of the priesthood—the high priest. He alone can enter the Holy of Holies, and that alone once a year, on the Day of Atonement, when he makes propitiation not only for himself and the priesthood, but for the entire congregation. The ritual of the Day of Atonement is the highest exercise of priestly mediatorship. On that day, the whole community has access to Jeh through their representative, the high priest, and through him offer atonement for their sins. Moreover, the rôle of the high priest as mediator is symbolized by his wearing the breastplate bearing the names of the children of Israel, whenever he goes into the Holy Place (Ex 28 29).

Something must be said of the sacrificial system, through which alone the priest exercised his mediatorial functions. For his mediatorship did not depend on his direct personal influence with God, exercised, for instance, through intercessory prayer (intercession is not mentioned by P as a duty of the priest, though referred to by the prophets, Joel 2 17; Mal 1 9). It depended rather on an elaborate system of sacrifice, of which the priest was but an official agent. It was he who derived his authority from the system, rather than the system from him. The most characteristic features in the ritual of the PC are the sin offering (hattā'th, Lev 4; 5; 6 21–30) and the guilt offering ('āshām, Lev 5–7, 14, 19), which seem peculiar to P. These are meant to restore the normal relation of the people or of individuals to God, a relation which sin has disturbed. Hence these sacrifices, when duly administered by the priest, are distinctly mediatorial or reconciliatory in character, i.e. they make atonement for or “cover” (kippēr) the sin of the guilty community or individuals. This seems the case also, though in a far less degree, even with the burnt, peace, and meal offerings, which, though “not offered expressly, like the sin and guilt offerings, for the forgiveness of sin, nevertheless were regarded . . . as ‘covering,’ or neutralizing, the offerer’s unworthiness to appear before God, and so, though in a much less degree than the sin or guilt offering, as effecting propitiation” (Driver in HDB, IV, 132). We must beware, however, of reading the full NT doctrine of sin and propitiation into the sacrificial law. Two important points of difference may be noted: (1) The law does not provide atonement for all sins, but only for sins of ignorance or inadvertence, committed within the covenant. Deliberate sins fall outside the scope of priestly mediation. (2) While sin includes moral impurity, it must be admitted that the chief emphasis falls on ceremonial uncleanness, because it is only violation of physical sanctity that can be fully rectified by ritual ordinance. The law was essentially a civil code, and was not adequate to deal with inward sins. Thus the sacrificial system in itself is but a faint adumbration of the NT doctrine of Christ’s high-priestly work, which has reference to sin in its widest and deepest meaning. Yet, in spite of these limitations, the priestly ritual was, as far as it went, an organized embodiment of the sin-consciousness, and so prepared the way for the coming of a perfect Mediator.

On another plane than that of the priest is the mediation of the theocratic king. Jeh was ideally the sole king of Israel. But He governed the people mediately through His vicegerent the theocratic king, the agent of His will. The king

5. The Theocratic King: the Messiah was regarded as “Jeh’s anointed” (1 S 16 6, etc), and his person as inviolable. He was the “visible representative of the invisible Divine King” (Richm). The ideal of the theocratic king was most nearly represented by David, the man after Jeh’s own heart (cf 1 S 13 14). This fact led to Jeh’s covenant-promise that David’s house should constitute a permanent dynasty, and his throne be established forever (2 S 7 5–17; cf Ps 89 19–37). The indestructibility of the Davidic dynasty was the basal conviction on which the hope of a Messiah was built. It led to attention being further concentrated on one preëminent King in David’s line, who should be the Divinely accredited representative of Jeh, and reign in His name. As a Divinely endowed human hero, the Messiah will possess attributes which will qualify Him to mediate between God and His people in national life and affairs, and so inaugurate the ideal age of peace and righteousness. He is portrayed esp. as the Royal Saviour of Israel, through whom the salvation of the people is mediated and justice administered (e.g. Isa 11 1–10; 61 1–3; Ps 72 4, 13; Jer 23 5, 6; 33 15, 16).

In the wonderful figure of exilic prophecy, the Suffering Servant of Jeh, the principle of mediation is exemplified both in its man-ward and God-ward aspects. In its man-ward aspect, his mission is the prophetic one of being God’s anointed messenger to men, His witness before the world (Isa 42 6, 19; 43 10; 49 2; 50 4, 5; 61 1–3). But the profound originality of the conception of the Servant lies chiefly in the God-ward significance of his suffering (Isa 53). The Servant suffered vicariously as an atonement for the sins of the people. His death is even said to be a “guilt-offering” ('āshām, ver 10), and he is represented as making “intercession for the transgressors” (ver 12). Here is the profoundest expression in the OT of the principle of mediatorship.

The substitution of voluntary, deliberate, human sacrifice for that of unwilling beasts elevates the sacrificial idea to a new ethical plane, and brings it into far more vital and organic relation to human life. The basis of the mediatorship of the Servant seems to be the principle of the solidarity or organic unity of the people, involving the ideal unity of the Servant and the people he represents. In the earlier servant-passages the Servant is identical with the whole nation (Isa 41 8; 44 1 f, and often), and the unity is therefore actual, not ideal merely. In other passages, however, they are clearly to be distinguished, for while the people as a whole is unfaithful to its mission, the Servant remains faithful and suffers for it. Whether in Isa 53 the Servant is the pious remnant of the people or is conceived of as an individual we need not here consider. In either case, the tie between the Servant and the whole nation is never completely broken; the idea of their mystical union is still the groundwork of the prophet’s thought. In virtue of this ideal relation, the Servant is the representative of the nation before God, not in a mere official sense (as in the case of the priest), but on the ground of personal merit, as the true Israel, the embodiment of the national ideal. On that ground God can accept his suffering in lieu of the deserved penalty of the whole people. We have here a wonderful adumbration of the NT doctrine of atonement through the One Mediator, the Son of Man, the representative of the race. See SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

In later Judaism, the growing sense of God’s transcendence favored the tendency to introduce supernatural intermediaries between

7. Super-human Agents of Mediation God and the world. (1) Angelic mediation.—Not until post-exilic times did angels come to have theological significance. Previously, when God was anthropomorphically conceived as appearing periodically on earth in visible form, the need of angelic mediation was not felt. The "angel" in early narrative (e.g. Gen 16 7-11) did not possess abiding personality distinct from God, but was God Himself temporarily manifested in human form. But the more God came to be conceived as "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity," the greater was the need for mediation between God and the world, and even between God and His servant the prophet. In post-exilic writers there is an increasing disposition to fill up the gap between God and the prophet with superhuman beings. Thus Zechariah receives all Divine instruction through angels; and similarly Daniel receives explanations of his dreams. We do not in the OT hear of angels interceding with God (God-ward mediation), but only as intermediaries of revelation and of the Divine will (man-ward mediation). Modern Jewish scholars deny that Judaistic angelology implied that God was transcendent in the sense of being remote and out of contact with the world. So, e.g., Montefiore (Hibbert Lectures, 423-31), but even he admits a "natural disinclination to bring the Godhead downward to human conditions," and that "for supernatural conversations angels formed a convenient substitute for God" (p. 430). The doctrine of angels had no influence on the NT doctrine of mediation, which moves on the plane of the ethical, rather than on the basis of the merely physical transcendence of God.

(2) Divine wisdom.—Of more importance as a preparation for the theology of the NT is the doctrine of Wisdom, in which the Jews found "a middle term between the religion of Israel and the philosophy of Greece." In Prov 8 22-31 Wisdom is depicted as an individual energy, God's elect Son, His companion and master-workman (ver 30) in creation, but whose chief delight is with the children of men. Though the personification is here purely ideal and poetical, and the ethical interest predominates over the metaphysical, yet we have in such a passage a clear proof of contact with Gr thought (esp. Platonism and Stoicism), and of the felt need of a mediator between God and the visible world. This mode of thought, linked to the Heb conception of the Divine Word as the efficient expression of God's thought and the medium of His activity (Isa 55 11; Ps 33 6; 107 20), has left its mark on Philo's Logos-doctrine and on the NT Christology. See WISDOM.

III. In Semi- and Non-canonical Jewish Literature.—In the Apoc, the idea of mediation is for the most part absent. We have one or two references to angelic intercession (Tob 12 12, 15), a function not attributed to angels in the OT, but prominent in later apocalyptic literature (e.g. En 9 10; 15 2; 40 6). The tradition of the agency of angels in the promulgation of the law is first found in the LXX of Dt 33 2 (not in the Heb original), but was greatly amplified in rabbinical literature (Jos. Ant. XV. v. 3). In Wisd a bold advance is made toward the conception of Wisdom as a personal mediator of creation (esp. 7 22-27). In later Judaism, the idea of the Word is further developed. The Tgs constantly refer the Divine activity to the mēmra or "Word" of God, where the OT refers it to God directly, and speaks of it as Israel's Intercessor before God and as Redeemer. This usage seems to arise out of a reluctance to bring God into immediate contact with the world; hence God's self-manifestation is represented as mediated through a quasi-personal agent. The tendency finds its full development, however, not among the Jerus Jews, but among the Jews of Alexandria, esp. in Philo's Logos-doctrine. Deeply influenced by the Platonic dualism, Philo thought of God as pure Spirit, incapable of contact with matter, so that without mediation God could not act on the world. To fill up the great gap he conceived of intermediary beings which represented at once the Ideas of Plato, the active Powers of the Stoics, and the angels of the OT. The highest of these was the Divine Logos, the mediator between the inaccessible, transcendent Being and the material universe. On the one hand, in relation to the world, the Logos is the Mediator of creation and of revelation; on the other, in his God-ward activity, he is the representative of the world before God, its High Priest, Intercessor, and Paraclete. Yet Philo's Logos was probably nothing more than a high philosophical abstraction vividly imagined in the mind. In spite of Philo's influence on early Christian theology, and even perhaps on some NT writers, his doctrine of mediation moves on quite different lines from the central NT doctrine, which is concerned above all with the reconciliation of God and man on account of sin, and not with the metaphysical reconciliation of the absolute and the finite world. The Mediator of Philo is an abstraction of speculative thought; the Mediator of the NT is a concrete historical person known to experience. See PHILO JUDAËUS.

IV. Mediation and Mediator in the NT.—The relatively independent lines of development which the conception of mediation has hitherto taken now meet and coalesce in Jesus Christ. The traditional division of Gospels Christ's mediatorial work into that of prophet, priest and king (very common since Calvin, but now often discarded) offers a convenient method of treating the subject, though we must avoid making the division absolute, as if Christ's work fell apart into three separate and independent functions. The unity of the work of salvation is preserved by the fact that "no one of the offices fills up a moment of time alone, but the others are always coöperative," although "Christ's mediatorial work puts now this, now that side in the foreground." "The triple division is of special value, because it sets in a vivid light the continuity between the OT theocracy and Christianity" (Dorner, System of Christian Doctrine, ET, III, 385 ff). These three aspects of Christ's mediatorship can be distinguished in the Synoptics, although the formal distinction is the work of later analysis.

(1) Christ as Prophet.—It was in the character of Prophet that He mainly impressed the common mind, which was moved to inquire "Whence hath this man this wisdom?" and by His reply, "A prophet is not without honor," etc, He virtually accepts that title (Mt 13 54, 57). As Prophet, Christ is the mediator of revelation; through Him alone can men come to know God as Father (Mt 11 27) and "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" (13 11). In all His teaching we feel that He speaks within the center of truth, and hence can teach with authority and not as the scribes (7 29), who approach the truth from without. His teaching is part of His redemptive work, and not something extraneous to it, for the sin from which He redeems includes ignorance and error.

(2) Christ as King.—The official name "Christ" (=Messiah, the anointed King) refers primarily to His kingship. The Messianic hope had taught men to look forward to the rule of God on earth instituted and administered through His representative. Christ was the fulfilment of that hope. Though He held an attitude of reserve in the matter, there can be no doubt that He conceived of Himself as the Messiah (Mk 8 27-30; 14 16 f; cf His entry into Jerus as a triumphant king, 11 1 ff; the inscription on the cross, 15 26). But it is also clear that He fundamentally modified the Messianic idea, (a) by suffusing it with the thought of vicarious suffering, and (b) by giving it an ethical and spiritual rather than a national and official significance. The note of His kingship was that of authority (Mk 1 27; 2 10; Mt 7 29; 28 18) exercised in the realm of truth and conscience. His kingship includes the future as well as the present; He is the arbiter of human destiny (Mt 25 31 ff).

(3) Christ as Priest, or, better, as Redeemer (the synoptists do not hint at the priestly analogy).—Our Lord often spoke of forgiveness without mentioning Himself as the one through whom it was mediated, as if it flowed directly from the gracious heart of the Father (cf the parables of Lk 15). But there are other passages which emphasize the close connection of His person with men's redemption. Men's attitude to Him decides absolutely their relation to God (Mt 10 32, 40). Rest of soul is mediated to the heavy laden through Him (Mt 11 28-30). He claims authority on earth to forgive sins (Mk 2 10). We have no evidence that He spoke definitely of His death until after Peter's confession at Caesarea (Mk 8 31, "began to teach," etc), though we seem to have vague allusions earlier (e.g. the allegory of the bridegroom, Mk 2 19.20). This may be partly due to conscious reserve, in accordance with the true pedagogical method by which He adapted His teaching to the progressive receptivity of His followers. But inasmuch as we must think of Him as subject to the ordinary laws of human psychology, the idea of His death must have been to Him a growth, matured partly by outward events, and partly by the development of His inner consciousness as the Suffering Messiah. In His later ministry, He frequently taught that He must suffer and die (Mk 9 12.31; 10 32 f; 12 8; 14 8 and || passages; cf Mk 10 38; Lk 12 49 f). There are two important passages which expressly connect His death with His mediatorial work. The first is Mk 10 45 || Mt 20 28, "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." The context shows that it was while the thought of His approaching death filled His mind that Our Lord uttered these words (cf Mk 10 33.38 f). As to the exact meaning of ransom (λύτρον, lutron) there are two circles of ideas with which it may be associated. (a) It may mean a sacrificial offering, representing Heb kōpher (lit. "covering," "propitiatory gift") which it translates several times in LXX (e.g. Ex 30 12). Thus Ritschl defines it as "an offering which, because of its specific worth to God, is a protection or covering against sin" (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, II, 68-88). (b) It may mean ransom price, the purchase-money paid for the emancipation of a slave. In LXX, lutron in most cases stands for some form of the roots gā'al, "to deliver," pād'hāh, "to redeem" (e.g. Lev 25 51; Nu 3 51). Hence Wendt explains the "ransom" as the price by which Jesus redeemed His disciples from their bondage to suffering and death (Teaching of Jesus, II, 226 ff). This analogy certainly suits the context better than that drawn from the Levitical ritual, for it brings out the contrast between the liberating work of Christ and the enslaving work of those who "lord it over" men. We must not press the analogy in detail or seek here an answer to the question, who was the recipient of the ransom price (e.g. whether the devil, as many Fathers, notably Origen and Gregory of Nyssa; God, as Anselm and later theologians; the "eternal law of righteousness," as Dale). The purpose of the passage is primarily practical, not speculative. It is certainly pressing the figurative language of Jesus too far to insist that the ransom price is the exact quantitative equivalent of the lives liberated, or of the penalty they had deserved regarded as a debt. This is too prosaic and literalistic an interpretation of a passage which has its setting in the ethical rather than in the commercial realm, and which breathes a spirit closely akin to that of Isa 53, where suffering and service are, as here, combined.

The other passage in which Christ definitely connects His mediatorship with His death is that which reports His words at the Last Supper (Mk 14 22-24; Mt 26 26-28; Lk 22 19 f; cf 1 Cor 11 24 f). The reported words are not identical in the several narratives. But even in their simplest form (in Mk), there is evidently a threefold allusion, to the paschal lamb, to the sacrifice offered by Moses at the ratification of the covenant at Sinai (Ex 24 8), and to Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant (31 31-34). There can be little doubt that the paschal feast, though it does not conform in detail to any of the Levitical sacrifices, was regarded as a sacrifice, as is indicated by the blood ceremonial (Ex 12 21-27). The blood of the covenant, too, is sacrificial; and, as we have seen, it is probable that all blood sacrifices, and not those of the sin and guilt offerings only, were associated with propitiatory power. Wendt denies that there is here any reference to sin and its forgiveness (Teachings of Jesus, II, 241 f). It must be admitted that the words in Mt "unto remission of sins," which have no counterpart in the other reports, are probably an explanatory expansion of the words actually uttered. But they are a true interpretation of their meaning, as is attested by the fact that the new covenant of Jeremiah's prophecy was one of forgiveness and justification (Jer 31 34), and that Christ speaks of His blood as shed for others. And as the Passover signified deliverance from bondage to an earthly power (Egypt), so the Supper stands for forgiveness and deliverance from a spiritual power (sin). Clearly Christ here represents Himself as the Mediator of the new covenant, through whom men are to find acceptance with God, though the exact modus operandi of His sacrifice is not indicated.

The Synoptics give special prominence to those historical events which are most intimately associated with Christ's mediatorship—not only the agony in the garden and the crucifixion, but also the resurrection and ascension (which make possible His intercessory mediation in heaven).

(1) The early speeches in Acts reveal a primitive stage of theological reflection. Yet they are essentially Christocentric. (a) It is the 2. Primitive Messianic Kingship of Christ that is Apostolic chiefly emphasized. The main thesis is that Jesus is the Messiah (the "anointed one"; cf Acts 4 27; 10 38), and that His Messiahship was realized in the crucifixion and attested by the resurrection. An important feature is the use of the title "Servant" for Christ (3 13.26; 4 27.30; cf 8 30-35), in evident reference to the Suffering Servant of Deutero-Isa. In the phrase, "thy holy Servant . . . whom thou didst anoint," coming immediately after the Messianic quotation, "against the Lord, and against his Anointed" (4 26 f), we have a concise instance of that coalescing of the idea of the Messiah with that of the Suffering Servant which gave the Messianic idea an entirely new meaning. As Messiah, Jesus was the sole Mediator of salvation (4 12). (b) Another OT type which finds its fulfilment in Jesus is that of the "prophet like unto" Moses (3 22; 7 37; cf Dt 18 15.18). (c) But the priestly functions of Christ are not explicitly touched on. The questions are not faced, What is the God-ward significance of His death? How is it effective for man's salvation? It is rather the man-ward significance that is made explicit, i.e. Jesus as Messiah mediates salvation to men from His place of exaltation at the right hand of God. Yet the germs of a God-ward mediation are found in the identification of the Messiah with the Suffering Servant.

(2) Epistles of James and Jude.—In these epp. the doctrine of Christ's mediation does not occupy a prominent place. To James, Christianity is the culmination of Judaism. Christ's mediatorial functions are set forth more by way of presupposition than by explicit statement, and the whole weight is laid on the kingly and prophetic offices. The Messiahship of Jesus is assumed to such an extent that the title "Christ" has become part of the proper name, and His Lordship is also implied (1 1; 2 1). Nothing definite is said of His function in salvation; it is God Himself who regenerates, but the medium of regeneration is "the word of truth," "the implanted word" (1 18.21), which must refer to the word which Jesus had preached. This implies that Jesus as prophetic teacher is the Mediator of salvation. Nothing is said of the death on the cross or its saving significance. The Ep. of Jude assumes the Lordship of Christ, through whom God's Saviourhood works, and whose mercy results in eternal life (vs 4.21.25).

(3) 1 Peter.—In 1 Pet we have the early apostolic teaching touched with Paulinism. The fact that salvation is mediated through the sufferings and death of Christ is now explicitly stated. Christ has suffered for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous (3 18). The suffering has significance both God-ward and man-ward. Relatively to God it is a sacrificial offering which opens up a way of access to Him; He suffered "that he might bring us to God" (3 18), and that through His representative priesthood the ideal "holy priesthood" of all God's people might be realized, for it is "through Jesus Christ" that men's "spiritual sacrifices" become "acceptable to God" (2 5). So the elect are sprinkled with the blood of Christ, i.e. brought into communion with God by His sacrifice (1 2). Relatively to man, it is a means of ransoming or liberating man from the bondage of sin. "Knowing that ye were redeemed (ἐλυτρώθητε, elutrothēte, lit. "ransomed," from lutron, "ransom," an echo of Mk 10 45) . . . with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 18.19). The sacrificial language is simple and undeveloped, and it is not clear whether the figure of "lamb" implies a reference to the paschal lamb or to Isa 53 7, or to both. The effect on man is, however, clear. Christ "bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed" (2 24; see the whole passage, vs 21-24, reminiscent of the figure of the Suffering Servant of Isa ch 53).

Christ's mediatorship stands at the very center of Paul's gospel; this in spite of the fact that only once does he apply the term "mediator" to Christ (1 Tim 2 5), and that of Paul in the only other passage where he uses the word, he applies it to Moses, in a sense which might seem to be inconsistent with the idea of Christ's mediatorship, viz. where he discusses the relation of law to promise. The law was "ordained through angels by the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not . . . of one; but God is one" (Gal 3 19.20).

This passage has had to undergo about 300 different interpretations. The view that the "mediator" here is Christ (Origen, Augustine and most of the Fathers, Calvin, etc) is clearly untenable. Modern exegetes agree that the reference is to Moses (cf Lev 26 46, where LXX has "by the hand of Moses"; Philo calls Moses "mediator and reconciler." De Vit. Moys. iii.19), who, according to a rabbinical tradition, received the Law through the intermediation of angels (cf Acts 7 53; He 2 2). Nor is it likely that Paul meant the reader to realize the glory of the law and the solemnity of its ordination (Meyer). The point is rather the inferiority of the law to the evangelical promise to Abraham. Mediation implies at least two parties between whom it is carried on. The law was given by a double mediatorship, that of the angels and that of Moses, and was thus two removes from its Divine source. But in relation to the promise God stood alone, i.e. acted freely, unconditionally, independently, and for Himself alone. The promise is no agreement between two, but the free gift of the one God (so Schliermacher, Lightfoot, etc). This is by no means a denial of the Divine origin of the law (Ritschl), for the mediation of angels and of Moses was Divinely authorized; but it does seem to make the method of mediation inferior to that of the direct communication of God's gracious will to man. Paul is not, however, treating of the principle of mediation in the abstract, but only that form of it which implies a contract between two parties. Christ is not Mediator in the same sense as Moses, for the free and unconditioned character of the forgiving grace which Christ mediates is by no means diminished by the fact of His mediation.

What, then, is Paul's positive teaching on Christ's Mediatorship?

(1) The need of a Mediator arises out of the fact of sin. Sin interrupts the harmonious relation between God and man. It results in a state of mutual alienation. On the one hand, man is in a state of enmity to God (Rom 5 10; 8 7; Col 1 21). On the other hand, God is moved to righteous wrath in relation to the sinner (Rom 1 18; 5 9; Eph 5 6; Col 3 6). Hence the need of a mutual change of attitude, a removal of God's displeasure against the sinner as well as of the sinner's hostility to God. God could not restore man to favor by a mere fiat, without some public exhibition of Divine righteousness, and vindication of His character as not indifferent to sin (cf Rom 3 25.26). Such exhibition demanded a Mediator.

(2) The qualification of Christ to be the Mediator depends on His intimate relation to both parties at variance.

(a) Christ's relation to man: Firstly, He is Himself a man, i.e. not merely "man" generically, but an individual man. The "one mediator between God and men" is "himself man, Christ Jesus" (1 Tim 2 5), "born of a woman" (Gal 4 4), "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom 8 3, where the word "likeness" does not make "flesh" unreal, but qualifies "sinful"), i.e. bore to the eye the aspect of an ordinary man; secondly, He bore a particular relation to a section of humanity, the Jews (Rom 1 3; 9 5); thirdly, He bore a universal relation to mankind in general. He was more than an individual among many, like a link in a chain. He was the Second Adam, the archetypal, universal, representative Man, whose actions therefore had significance beyond Himself and were ideally the actions of humanity, just as Adam's act had, on a lower plane, a significance for the whole race (Rom 5 12-21; 1 Cor 15 22.45).

(b) His relation to God: Paul very frequently speaks of Christ as the "Son of God," and that in a unique sense. Moreover, He was the "image of God" (2 Cor 4 4; Col 1 15), and subsisted originally "in the form of God" (Phil 2 6). He is set alongside with God over against idols (1 Cor 8 5.6), and is coördinated with God in the benediction (2 Cor 13 14). Clearly Paul sets Him in the Divine sphere over against all that is not God. Yet he assigns Him a certain subordination, and even asserts that His mediatorial kingship will come to an end, that God may be all in all (1 Cor 15 24.28). But this cessation of His function as Mediator of salvation, when its end shall have been attained, cannot affect His Divine dignity, "since the mediatorial sovereignty which is now ceasing was not its cause, but its consequence" (B. Weiss, II, 396).

(3) The means of effecting the reconciliation was mainly the death on the cross. Paul emphasizes the mediating value of the death both on its objective (God-ward) side and on its subjective (man-ward) side. First, it is the objective ground of forgiveness and favor with God. On the basis of what Christ has done, God ceases to reckon to men their sins (2 Cor 5 19). Paul's view of the death may be seen by considering some of his most characteristic expressions. (a) It is an act of reconciliation. This involves a change of attitude, not only in man, but in God, a relinquishing of the Divine wrath without which there can be no restoration of peaceful relations (though this is disputed by many, e.g. Ritschl, Lightfoot, Westcott, Beyschlag), but not a change of nature or of intention, for the Divine wrath is but a mode of the eternal love, and moreover it is the Father Himself who provides the means of reconciliation and undertakes to accomplish it (2 Cor 5 19; cf Col 1 20.21; Eph 2 16). (b) It is an act of propitiation (Rom 3 25, ἱλαστήριον, hilastērion, from ἱλάσkesthai, hiláskesthai, "to render favorable" or "propitious"). Here there is a clear though tacit reference to a change of attitude on God's part. He who was not formerly propitious to man was appeased through the death of Christ. Yet the propitiatory means are provided by God Himself, who takes the initiative in the matter ("whom God set forth," etc.). (c) It is a ransom. The Mediator "gave himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim 2 6). The idea of payment of a ransom price is clearly implied in the word "redemption" (Rom 3 24; 1 Cor 1 30; Eph 1 7; Col 1 14, ἀπολύτρωσις, apolútrōsis, from lutron, "ransom"). It is not alone the fact of liberation (Westcott, Ritschl), but also the cost of liberation that is referred to. Hence Christians are said to be "redeemed," "bought with a price" (Gal 3 13; 4 5; 1 Cor 6 20; 7 23; cf 1 Pet 1 18 f.). Yet the metaphor cannot be pressed to yield an answer to the question to whom the ransom was paid. All that can safely be said is that it expresses the tremendous cost of our salvation, viz. the self-surrendered life ("the blood") of Christ. (d) Strong substitutionary language is sometimes used, notably in Gal 3 13 ("having become a curse for us") and in 2 Cor 5 21 ("Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf"). But the sinless substitute is not regarded as actually punished (that would be a moral contradiction). His death was not penal substitution, but a substitute for penalty. It had the value to God of the punishment of sinners, in virtue of His oneness with the race. It was the recognition from within humanity of the sinfulness of sin, and expressed the Divine righteousness as fully as penalty would have done. The secret seems to be Christ's sympathetic love by which He identified Himself with man's sin and doom of death. (e) Sacrificial language is used, as in 1 Cor 5 7; Eph 5 2, and in the references to Christ's "blood." Not often, however, does Paul explicitly speak of the death in terms of the Levitical ritual, which would be less congenial to his mind than the prophetic conception of the Suffering Servant. Yet he does seem to regard the death of Christ as the culmination of all that the sacrifices of the OT had imperfectly realized. Secondly, the subjective aspect of Christ's work is emphasized quite as much as the objective. The death of Christ, being inwardly assimilated by faith, becomes to the believer the principle of ethical transformation, so that he may become worthy of the Divine favor which he now enjoys. As a result of his subjective identity with Christ through faith, the objective state of privilege is changed into actual liberation from sin (Gal 2 20; 6 14; Rom 6 6, 7; Col 3 3).

(4) The resurrection and exaltation of Christ are essential to His mediatorial work (1 Cor 15 17). It is not alone that the resurrection "proves that the death of Christ was not the death of a sinner, but the vicarious death of the sinless Mediator of salvation" (B. Weiss, I, 436), but that salvation cannot be realized except through communion with the living, glorified Christ, without which the subjective identity of the believer with Christ by which redemption is personally appropriated would not be possible (Gal 2 20; Rom 6 4, 5; Phil 3 10; Col 3 1). The exaltation also makes possible His continuous heavenly intercession on our behalf (Rom 8 34), which is the climax of His mediatorial activities.

(5) The cosmic aspect of Christ's mediatorship.—In his later epp. (esp. Col and Eph), Paul lays stress on Christ's mediatorial activity in creation and providence, though the germs of his later teaching are found in the earlier epp. (1 Cor 8 6). He is resisting a kind of nascent gnostic dualism, according to which God could communicate with the world only through a hierarchy of intermediate powers. Against this he proclaims Christ as the one and only Mediator between God and the universe, having, on the one hand, a unique relation to God ("the image of the invisible God," Col 1 15; in whom the fulness of God dwells, 1 19; 2 9), and, on the other hand, a unique relation to the world, as its creative agent, its immanent principle of unity, and its ultimate goal (1 15–17). Here the apostle shows affinity with the Logos-doctrine of Philo, though the differences are marked and fundamental. Corresponding to this wider view of Christ's person, there is a wide view of the reconciliation wrought through Him. It even extends to the world beyond man, and restores the broken harmony of the universe (Col 1 20; Eph 1 10).

The main thesis of He is the absoluteness and finality of the gospel and its superiority over Judaism.

4. The Epistle depends on the fact that it has a perfect Mediator, who is the substance of to the which the various Jewish forms of Hebrews mediation were types and shadows.

He illustrates this by a series of contrasts between Christ and the mediators of the old system (by the application of principles and exegetical methods which reveal the influence of the school of Philo). In each contrast, Christ's superiority is based on His Sonship. (1) Christ is superior to the prophets as Mediator of revelation. The OT revelation was fragmentary and multifarious, while now God speaks, not through many agents, but through One, and that one a Son. As Son He is the perfectly adequate expression of the Father. The author takes us at once to the high transcendental sphere of Christ's relations to God and the universe, in virtue of which He is God's Mediator in creation, providence, revelation and redemption (1 1–3). (2) He is superior to the angels, through whose mediation the law was given (1 4–14). (3) He is superior to Moses, the human agent in the giving of the law (3 1–6). (4) He is greater than Aaron the high priest, the people's representative before God. This leads to the central doctrine of the ep., the high-priesthood of Jesus. The following are the salient points in the elaborate treatment of this subject:

(1) Christ's qualification for the high-priesthood is twofold: (a) His participation in all human experience (except sin), which guarantees His power of sympathy. Every high priest, as men's representative before God, must be "taken from among men" (5 1). Hence the author lays great stress on the human nature and experiences of Christ (cf 2 10, 17, 18; 4 15; 5 7, 8). (b) His Divine appointment. Every priest must have a call from God. So Christ has been appointed priest, not indeed in the Aaronic line, but after the order of Melchizedek (5 1–10).

(2) The nature of His priesthood, its superiority to the Levitical priesthood.—The priests of the OT themselves needed atonement, for they were not sinless; Christ is holy, guileless, undefiled, and need not make atonement for His own sins. They were priests only for a time, and were many in number, for they were mortal; but He abideth forever, and His priesthood is eternal. They were dependent on the law of physical descent; He was a priest after the order of Melchizedek, whose priesthood did not depend on genealogy or pedigree, and who combined the functions of king with those of priest. In a word, their order was transient, temporary, shadowy; His belonged to the world of unchanging reality (ch 7).

(3) The realization of His high-priesthood.—A high priest implies a sacrifice; hence Christ must "have somewhat to offer" (8 3). In the Levitical system, the priest and the sacrifice are distinct from each other. But Christ offered not an external gift, but Himself. Much stress is laid on Christ's voluntary obedience (5 8; 10 7), progressively attained through suffering, and culminating in the absolute surrender of His life ("blood") in death. His sacrifice harmonizes with the principle that "apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (9 22), although the principle is lifted from the physical to the spiritual realm. In working this out, the author makes use of analogies drawn from three parts of the Levitical ritual. (a) Christ's death was a sin offering. He has offered one final sacrifice for sins (10 12, 18). As priest, he has "made propitiation for the sins of the people" (2 17); as victim He was "once [for all] offered to bear the sins of many" (9 28). (b) The Sinaitic covenant (Ex 24 8) is made use of. Christ is "the mediator of a new [better] covenant" (8 6; 9 15; 12 24), i.e. the agent interposing between God and man in the establishment of a new relationship analogous to Moses in the old covenant. Even the first covenant was dedicated with blood, and so the blood of the Son of God was "the blood of the covenant" (10 29; cf Mk 14 24). On the double meaning of the word dialhékē ("covenant," "testament"), the author bases a twofold argument for the necessity of Christ's death (9 15 ff). (c) The ritual of the Day of Atonement furnishes another analogy. As the high priest once a year entered the most holy place of the earthly people, so Christ has entered once for all the true spiritual sanctuary in heaven, and there He presents Himself to God as the Mediator able to make intercession for us with the Father (9 12, 24-26; cf 7 25). He is a ministering priest in the true tabernacle, the immediate presence of God (8 2). Thus the ascension and session make possible the culmination of the mediatorial work of Christ in the eternal sacrifice and intercession within the veil.

(4) The man-ward efficacy of His mediatorship.—The effect of Christ's death on man is described by the words "cleanse," "sanctify," "perfect" (9 14; 10 10, 14, 29; 13 12), words which have a ritualistic quite as much as an ethical sense, meaning the removal of the sense of guilt, dedication to God, and the securing of the privilege of full fellowship with Him. The ultimate blessing that comes to man through the work of Christ is the privilege of free, unrestricted access to God by the removal of the obstacle of guilt (4 16; 10 19 ff).

(1) The Fourth Gospel.—Aspects of Our Lord's teaching unassimilated by the other disciples, and therefore but meagerly touched on in the Synoptics, find prominence in the

5. The Johannine Writings

The Gospel of Jn, but colored by his own meditations. Great emphasis is laid on the idea of salvation by revelation mediated through Jesus Christ. The historical revelation of God in the person and teaching of Jesus is the main subject of the Gospel. But in the Prologue we have the eternal background of the historical manifestation in the doctrine of the Logos, who, as Son in eternal fellowship with the Father, His mediator in creation, and the immanent principle of revelation in the world, is fitted to become God's Revealer in history (vs 11-18). His work on earth is to dispense light and life, knowledge of God and salvation. Through Him God gives to the world eternal life (3 16). He is the Water of Life (4 14; 7 37), the Bread of Life (6 48 ff), the Light of the World (8 12); it is by inward appropriation of Him that salvation is mediated to men (6 52 ff). He is the perfect revealer of God, hence the only means of access to the Father (14 6, 9). It is on salvation by illumination and communion, rather than on salvation by reconciliation and atonement that chief stress is laid. Sacrificial or propitiatory language is not used of Christ's death. Yet emphasis is laid on the voluntary and vicarious character of His death. He lays down His life of Himself (10 18); "The good shepherd layeth down his life for [=on behalf of] the sheep" (10 11; cf 15 13). Christ's death was the supreme example of the law that self-sacrifice is necessary to the highest and most fruitful life (12 23 ff). In ch 17 we have a unique instance of Our Lord's intercessory prayer.

(2) The epistles.—In 1 Jn we find more explicit statements with regard to the connection between the death of Christ and sin. "The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin" (1 7); "He was manifested to take away sins" (3 5); "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father," i.e. a pleader who will mediate with God on our behalf, the ground of His intercessory efficacy being that He is the "propitiation for our sins" (2 2; 4 10, a term which links the Johannine doctrine to that of Paul, though 1 Jn represents Christ Himself, and not merely His death on the cross, as the propitiation). This latter term shows that an objective value is attached to the atonement, as in some way neutralizing or making amends for sin in the eyes of God, yet in such a way as not to contradict the principles of righteousness (cf "Jesus Christ the righteous," 2 1).

(3) The Apocalypse presents both aspects of Christ's mediation. On the one hand, He is associated with God in the government of the world and in judgment (3 21; 7 10; 6 16), holds the keys of death and Hades (1 18), is the Lord of lords and King of kings (17 14; 19 16), and is the Mediator of creation (3 14). On the other hand, by His sacrificial act He represents men before God. The most characteristic expression of this is the title "the Lamb" (29 t). By His blood the guilty are cleansed and made saints, purchased unto God (5 9; 7 14). The lamb is the symbol of the sacrificial love which is the heart of God's sovereignty (5 6). It is not clear whether the allusion in this title is to the paschal lamb or to the Suffering Servant pictured as a lamb led to the slaughter (Isa 53 7), or to both. In any case it contains the idea of Christ's redemptive sacrifice, which is declared to be an essential part of God's eternal counsel (13 8 m, "the Lamb that hath been slain from the foundation of the world").

V. Conclusion.—Our inquiry will have shown how central and prominent is the idea of mediation throughout the Scriptures. We might even say it supplies the key to the unity of the Bible. In the OT the principle is given "in divers portions and in divers manners," but in the NT it converges in the doctrine of the person and work of the One final Mediator, the Son of God. Amid all the rich diversity of the various parts of the NT, there is one fundamental conception common to all, that of Christ as at once the interpreter of God to men and the door of access for men to God. Especially is Christ's self-sacrifice presented as the effective cause of our salvation, as a means of removing the guilt and sin which stand as a barrier in the way of God's purpose concerning man and of man's fellowship with God. There is a tendency in some influential writers of today to speak disparagingly of the doctrine of the one Mediator, on the ground that it injures the direct relationship of man with God (e.g. R. Eucken, Truth of Religion, 583 ff). Here we can reply only that the doctrine properly defined is attested in universal Christian experience, and that, so far from standing in the way of our personal approach to God, it is a simple historical fact that apart from the work of Jesus we would not enjoy that free access to Him which is now our privilege.

MEDICINE, med'i-sin, med'i-s'n (מֵדִינָה, gēhāh, מְרִפָּה, rūphāh, רִפְּיָה, r-phu'āh): These words are used in the sense of a remedy or remedies for disease. In Prov 17 22 AV, a merry heart is said to do good "like a medicine." There is an alternative reading in AVm, "to a medicine." RV "is a good medicine"; RVM gives another rendering, "causeth good healing," which is the form that occurs in the LXX and which was adopted by Kimchi and others. Some of the Tgs, substituting a waw for the first h in gēhāh, read here "doeth good to the body," thus making this clause antithetic to the latter half of the verse. In any case the meaning is that a cheerful disposition is a powerful remedial agent.

In the figurative account of the evil case of Judah and Israel because of their backsliding (Jer 30 13), the prophet says they have had no r-phu'āh, or "healing medicines." Later on (Jer 46 11), when pronouncing the futility of the contest of Neco against Nebuchadrezzar, Jeremiah compares Egypt to an incurably sick woman going up to Gilead to take balm as a medicine, without any benefit. In Ezekiel's vision of the trees of life, the leaves are said (AV) to be for medicine, RV reads "healing," thereby assimilating the language to that in Rev 22 2, "leaves of the tree . . . for the healing of the nations" (cf Ezk 47 12).

Very few specific remedies are mentioned in the Bible. "Balm of Gilead" is said to be an anodyne (Jer 8 22; cf 51 8). The love-fruits, "mandrakes" (Gen 30 14) and "caperberry" (Eccl 12 5m), myrrh, anise, rue, cummin, the "oil and wine" of the Good Samaritan, soap and sodic carbonate ("natron," called by mistake "nitre") as cleansers, and Hezekiah's "fig poultice" nearly exhaust the catalogue. In the Apoc we have the heart, liver and gall of Tobit's fish (Tob 6 7). In the Egypt pharmacopoeia are the names of many plants which cannot be identified, but most of the remedies used by them were dietetic, such as honey, milk, meal, oil, vinegar, wine. The Bab medicines, as far as they can be identified, are similar. In the Mish we have references to wormwood, poppy, hemlock, aconite and other drugs. The apothecary mentioned in AV (Ex 30 25, etc) was a maker of perfumes, not of medicines. Among the fellahtn many common plants are used as folk-remedies, but they put most confidence in amulets or charms, which are worn by most Palestinian peasants to ward off or to heal diseases. MEDITATION, med-i-tā'shun (מְהִיטָה, hāghūth, מְהִיטָה, sīhāh): "Meditation" is the tr of hāghūth, from hāghāh, "to murmur," "to have a deep tone," hence "to meditate" (Ps 49 3); of hāghāh, "sighing," "moaning" (Ps 5 1; see ver 2); of higgāyōn, "the murmur" or dull sound of the harp, hence meditation (Ps 19 14, "Let . . . the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight"); of sīhāh, "speech," "meditation" (Ps 104 34, "Let my meditation be sweet unto him"); of sīhāh, a "bowing down," "musing" (Ps 119 97,99; 2 Esd 10 5). "To meditate" is the tr of hāghāh (Josh 1 8; Ps 1 2; 63 6; Isa 33 18 AV); of sīhāh (Gen 24 63); of sīhāh (Ps 119 15,23, etc; 143 5, AV "muse"; 1 Ch 16 9; Ps 105 2m). In Apoc we have "to meditate" (Eccles 14 20, "Blessed is the man that shall meditate in wisdom," RVM "most authorities read come to an end" [teleutēsei]; 39 1, "meditateth in the law of the Most High" [dianoéomai]). The lack of meditation is a great want in our modern religious life. In the NT, we have "to meditate" (προμελεῶν, prōmeleāō, "to take care beforehand"), Lk 21 14, and 'meditate' (μελεῶν, meleāō, "to take care"), 1 Tim 4 15 AV (RV "be diligent"); cf Phil 4 8; Col 3 2. MEDITERRANEAN, med-i-te-rā'nē-an, SEA (ἡ θάλασσα, hē thalassa): To the Hebrews the Mediterranean was the sea, as was natural from their situation.

Hence they speak of it simply as "the sea" (הַיָּם, ha-yām), e.g. Gen 49 13; Nu 13 29; 34 5; Jgs 5 17; or, again, it is "the great sea" (הַיָּם הַגָּדוֹל, ha-yām ha-gādōl), e.g. Nu 34 6,7; Josh 9 1; 15 12,47; Ezk 47 10,15,19,20; 48 28); or, because it lay to the W. of Pal, as "the great sea toward the going down of the sun" (Josh 1 4; 23 4), and, since the west was regarded as the "back," in contrast to the east as the "front," as "hinder [or "western" RV, "utmost" or "utmost" AV] sea" (הַיָּם הַחֲדָרֹן, ha-yām ha-'ahārōn), Dt 11 24; 34 2; Zec 14 8; Joel 2 20, in the last two passages contrasted with "the former [AV, "eastern" RV] sea" (הַיָּם הַקֶּדְמוֹן, ha-yām ha-kādēmōn), i.e. the Dead Sea. See FORMER. That portion of the Mediterranean directly W. of Pal is once (Ex 23 31) referred to as "the sea of the Philis" (יָם פְּלִשְׁתִּים, yām pelishtim). AV has "sea of Joppa" (Ezr 3 7) where RV correctly renders "to the sea, unto Joppa" (cf 2 Ch 2 16). Similarly, AV "the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia" (Acts 27 5) is better rendered "the sea which is off Cilicia and Pamphylia" (RV).

In the NT, references to the Mediterranean are common, esp. in the accounts of Paul's voyages, for which see PAUL. Jesus once (Mk 7 24 ff) came to or near the sea.

The Mediterranean basin was the scene of most ancient civilizations which have greatly influenced that of the western world, excepting those whose home was in the valleys of the Tigris and the Euphrates; and even these continually thrust themselves into it, so far as they could. As its name implies, it is an inland area, united to the Atlantic only by the narrow Straits of Gibraltar. In comparatively recent geological time it was also joined to the Red Sea, the alluvial deposits of the Nile, which have extended the line of the Delta, having with the aid of drifting desert sands subsequently closed the passage and joined the continents of Asia and Africa. The total length of the Mediterranean is about 2,300 miles, its greatest breadth about 1,080 miles, and its area about 1,000,000 sq. miles. It falls naturally into the western and eastern (Levant) halves, dividing at the line running from Tunis to Sicily, where it is comparatively shallow; the western end is generally the deeper, reaching depths of nearly 6,000 ft. On the N. it is intersected by the Italian and Balkan peninsulas, forming the Gulf of Lyons, the Adriatic and the Aegean. In ancient times these and other divisions of the Mediterranean bore specific names given by the Greeks and Romans, but from the nature of the case their limits were ill defined. The temperature of the Mediterranean is in summer warmer, in winter about the same as that of the Atlantic. Its water has a slightly greater specific gravity, probably because of a larger proportionate evaporation.

MEEDA, mē-ē'da. See MEEDDA.

MEEDDA, mē-ed'a (מַעֲדָא, Meeddā, but Swete, Δεῦδα, Deddā, following B; AV Meeda): The head of one of the families of Nethinim (temple slaves) who went up with Zerubbabel from the captivity (1 Esd 5 32); identical with "Mehida" of Ezr 2 52 and Neh 7 54.

MECKNESS, mēk'nes (מִלִּנְיָ, ānāwāh; πραΰτης, praūtēs, πραΰτης, praūtēs): "Meekness" in the OT (ānāwāh, ānwāh) is from ānāw, "suffering," "oppressed," "afflicted," denoting the spirit produced under such experiences. The word is sometimes tr<sup>d</sup> "poor" (Job 24 4, RVm "meek"; Am 8 4); "humble" (Ps 9 12, RVm "meek"); "lowly" (Prov 3 34; 16 19, RV "poor," m "meek"). It is generally associated with some form of oppression. The "meek" were the special objects of the Divine regard, and to them special blessings are promised (Ps 22 26, "The meek shall eat and be satisfied"; 25 9, "The meek will be guide in justice; and the meek will he teach his way"; 37 11, "The meek shall inherit the land"; 147 6, "Jeh upholdeth the meek"; 149 4, "He will beautify the meek with salvation," RVm "victory"; cf Isa 11 4; 29 19; 61 1, "Jehovah hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek," RVm "poor"; Zeph 2 3; Ps 45 4, "because of [RVm "in behalf of"] truth and meekness and righteousness"). Of Moses it is said he "was very meek, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth," notwithstanding the Divine revelations given him, and in the face of opposition (Nu 12 3; cf 2 Cor 12 1-6). Meekness is ascribed even to Jeh himself (2 S 22 36, "Thy gentleness [ānāwāh] hath made me great"; cf Ps 18 36 [ānwāh], RVm "condescension"); men are exhorted to seek it (Zeph 2 3, "Seek righteousness, seek meekness"; cf Prov 15 1; 16 14; 25 15; Eccl 10 4).

In the Apoc also "meekness" holds a high place (Ecclesi 1 27, "The fear of the Lord is wisdom and instruction: faith and meekness are his delight," RV "in faith and meekness is his good pleasure"; Ecclesi 3 19, "Mysteries are revealed unto the meek" [RV omits]; cf 10 14).

"Meekness" in the NT (praūtēs, praūtēs) is not merely a natural virtue, but a Christian "grace"; it is one of the "fruits of the Spirit" (Gal 5 23). The conception of meekness, as it had been defined by Aristotle, was raised by Christianity to a much higher level, and associated with the commonly despised quality of humility (see s.v.). It was the spirit of the Saviour Himself (Mt 11 29): "I am meek [prāos] and lowly in heart" (cf 2 Cor 10 1, "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ"); it presupposes humility, flows from it, and finds expression in moderation (see s.v.). (See Trench, Syn. of NT, 145; WH, NT Lexicon, s.v.) Christians are exhorted to cherish it and show it in their relations to one another (Eph 4 2; Col 3 12; 1 Tim 6 11; Tit 3 2, "showing all meekness toward all men"); it ought to characterize Christian teachers or those in authority in "instructing [RV "correcting"] m "instructing" them that oppose themselves" (2 Tim 2 25); the saving, "implanted" (RVm "inborn") word is to be received "with meekness" (Jas 1 21); a man is to "show by his good life his works in meekness of wisdom" (3 13), and to give a reason for the hope that is in him, "with meekness and fear" (1 Pet 3 15).

The interchangeableness of "meek" with "poor," etc., in the OT ought to be specially noted. Our Lord's opening of His ministry at Nazareth (Lk 4 18, "He anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor"), and His message to John (Mt 11 5, "The poor have good tidings preached to them") are in harmony therewith.

MEET, mēt, adj. (יָשָׁר, yāshār; ἄξιος, axios): Various words are employed to express meetness, the sense of what is proper, worthy, or fit. We have yāshār, "straight," "upright," "right" (2 K 10 3, "meetest"; Jer 26 14, RV "right"); yāshar (Jer 27 5, RV "right"); yōsher (Prov 11 24, RVm "what is justly due"); ārikh, Aram. "meet" (Ezr 4 14); b'nē, "sons of" (Dt 3 18, AV "meet for the war," m "Heb sons of power," RV "men of valor"); kūn, "to be right," etc (Ex 8 26); āsāh, "to be made," "used" (Ezr 15 5 bis, RVm "made into"); šālēh, "to be good or fit for" (Ezr 15 4, RV "profitable"); rā'āh, "seen," "looked out," "chosen" (Est 2 9); axios, "worthy" (Mt 3 8; Acts 26 20, RV "worthy"; 1 Cor 16 4; 2 Thess 1 3); dikaïos, "just," "right" (Phil 1 7, RV "right"; 2 Pet 1 13, RV "right"); eūthetos, "well set" (He 6 7); eūchrēstos, "very useful," "profitable" (2 Tim 2 21, "meet for the master's use"); hikanós, "sufficient" (1 Cor 15 9); hikanós, "to make sufficient" (Col 1 12); kalós, "beautiful," "honest" (Mt 15 26; Mk 7 27); dei, "it behooveth" (Lk 15 32; Rom 1 27, RV "due"). For "meet" (supplied) (Jgs 5 30), RV has "on"; for "Surely it is meet to be said unto God" (Job 34 31), "For hath any said unto God?" In 2 Macc 9 12, we have dikaïos, RV "right."

MEGIDDO, mē-gid'dō, MEGIDDON, mē-gid'dōn (מֶגִּדּוֹ, mēghiddō, מֶגִּדּוֹן, mēghiddōn; Μαγιδδῶ, Magiddō, Μαγιδδῶν, Mageddōn, Μαγιδῶ, Magdō): A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was slain by Joshua (Josh 12 21). It lay within the territory of Issachar, but was one of the cities assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17 11; 1 Ch 7 29). Manasseh, however, was not able to expel the Canaanites, who therefore continued to dwell in that land. Later, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, the Canaanites were put to taskwork (Josh 17 12 f; Jgs 1 27 f). The host of Sisera was drawn to the river Kishon, and here, "by the waters of Megiddo," the famous battle was fought (5 19). By the time of Solomon, Israel's supremacy was unquestioned. Megiddo was included in one of his administrative districts (1 K 4 12), and it was one of the cities which he fortified (9 15). Ahaziah, mortally wounded at the ascent of Gur, fled to Megiddo to die (2 K 9 27). At Megiddo, Josiah, king of Judah, attempted to arrest Pharaoh-nechoh and his army on their march to the Euphrates against the king of Assyria. Here the Egypt monarch "slew him . . . when he had seen him," and from Megiddo went the sorrowful procession to Jerus with Josiah's corpse (2 K 23 29 f; 2 Ch 35 20 ff). The sad tale is told again in 1 Esd 1 25 ff. "The mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon" became a poetical expression for the deepest and most despairing grief (Zec 12 11). See also ARMAGEDDON.

The constant association of Megiddo with Taanach (Tell Ta'anek) points to a position on the south edge of the plain of Esdraelon. In confirmation of this, we read (RP, 1st series, II, 35-47) that Thothmes III captured Megiddo, after having defeated the Palestinian allies who opposed him. He left his camp at Aruna (possibly 'Ar'arah), and, following a defile (possibly Wādī 'Arah), he approached Megiddo from the S. We should thus look for the city where the pass opens on the plain; and here, at Khān el-Lejjūn, we find extensive ruins on both sides of a stream which turns several mills before falling into the Kishon. We may identify the site with Megiddo, and the stream with "the waters of Megiddo." Pharaoh-necoh would naturally take the same line of march, and his advance could be nowhere more hopefully opposed than at el-Lejjūn. Tell el-Mutasellim, a graceful mound hard by, on the edge of the plain, may have formed the acropolis of Megiddo.

The name Mujadda' attaches to a site 3 miles S. of Beisān in the Jordan valley. Here Conder would place Megiddo. But while there is a resemblance in the name, the site really suits none of the Bib. data. The phrase "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo" alone confines us to a very limited area. No position has yet been suggested which meets all the conditions as well as el-Lejjūn.

The Khan here shows that the road through the pass from Esdraelon to the plain of Sharon and the coast was still much frequented in the Middle Ages.

MEHETABEL, mē-het'a-bel, MEHETABEEL, mē-het'a-bēl (מֵהֶתֶבֶל, m'hēṭabb'ēl, "whom God makes happy"):

(1) Daughter of Matred, wife of Hadad or Hadar, the 8th and apparently last of the kings of Edom (Gen 36 39; 1 Ch 1 50).

(2) Grandfather of that Shemaiah who played a treacherous part against Nehemiah at the suggestion of Tobiah and Sanballat, by trying to persuade Nehemiah to commit sacrilege (Neh 6 10-13).

MEHIDA, mē-hī'da (מְהִידָּה, m'hīdhā', "renowned"; "Meeda" [1 Esd 5 32]): Ancestor and patronymic of a family of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54).

MEHIR, mē'hēr (מְהִיר, m'hīr, "price," "hire"): A descendant of Judah, son of Chelub, nephew of Shuah (1 Ch 4 11). Perug, a Chaldee name of equivalent meaning, is given for this person in the Tg of R. Joseph.

MEHOLATHITE, mē-hō'la-thīt (מְהוֹלָתִי, m'hō-lāthī): The gentile designation of Adriel, the son of Barzillai, who married Merab, the daughter of King Saul (1 S 18 19; 2 S 21 8), the name Michal in 2 S 21 8 being doubtless a copyist's error. See ABEL-MEHOIAH.

MEHUJAEI, mē-hū'jā-el (מְהוּיָאֵל, m'hūyā'ēl, מְהוּיָאֵל, m'hūyā'ēl, "smitten of God"): A descendant of Cain through Enoch and Irad (Gen 4 18). The list in Gen 5 12 ff is a working-over of the same material of genealogy by another hand at a different date of spelling (cf spelling of Chaucer and that of today). In that case, Mehalalel would be the correspondent name to Mehujael (see Expos T, X, 353).

MEHUMAN, mē-hū'man (מְהוּמָן, m'hūmān [Est 1 10]): A eunuch of Ahasuerus, the first of the seven chamberlains.

MEHUNIM, mē-hū'nim (מְהוּנִים, m'ūnīm). See MEUNIM.

ME-JARKON, mē-jār'kon (מֵי הַיַּרְקוֹן, mē ha-yarqōn; θάλασσα Ἰεράκων, thalassa Hierákōn): The Heb may mean "yellow water." The phrase is lit. "the waters of Jarkon." LXX reads "and from the river, Jarkon the boundary near Joppa." From this possibly we should infer a place called Jarkon in the lot of Dan; but no name resembling this has been found. The text (Josh 19 46) is corrupt.

MEKONAH, mē-kō'na (מֶכֶן, m'khōnāh). See MECONAH.

MELATIAH, mel-a-ti'a (מֶלְטִיָּה, m'latyāh, "Jeh's deliverance"): A Gibeonite who assisted in building the wall of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 7).

MELCHI, mel'kī (Tisch., Treg., WH, Μελχι, Melchēi; TR, Μελχι, Melchī): The name of two ancestors of Jesus according to Lk's genealogy, one being in the 4th generation before Joseph, the husband of Mary, the other being in the 3d generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 24.28).

MELCHIAH, mel-kī'a (מֶלְכִיָּה, malkhīyah, "Jeh's king"): A priest and father of Pashur (Jer 21 1 AV); elsewhere and in RV called MALCHIAH and MALCHIJAH (q.v.).

MELCHIAS, mel-kī'as (B, Μελχίας, Melchēias, B<sup>A</sup>, -ias, -ias): Name of three men who had taken "strange wives":

(1) 1 Esd 9 26 = "Malchijah" (Ezr 10 25).

(2) 1 Esd 9 32 = "Malchijah" (Ezr 10 31).

(3) One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand when the law was read (1 Esd 9 44) = "Malchijah" (Neh 8 4), possibly identical with (1) or (2).

MELCHIEL, mel'ki-el (Μελχιήλ, Melchīēl, B, Μελχιήλ, Melchēīēl): The father of Charmis, one of the governors of Bethulia (Jth 6 15). Other readings are Σελλήμ, Sellēm, and Μοχισήλ, Mochisēl.

MELCHISHUA, mel-ki-shōō'a (מֶלְכִישׁוּא, mal-kīshūā', "king's help"). See MALCHISHUA.

MELCHIZEDEK, mel-kiz'ē-dek, and (AV in He) MELCHISEDEC (מֶלְכִי־צֶדֶק, malkī-cēdek, "Cēdek, or Cidhiq is my king" [Gen 14 18 ff; Ps 110 4]; Μελχισέdek, Melchisēdek [He 5 6 10; 6 20; 7 1.10.11.15.17]): The name is explained in He 7 2 as "king of righteousness," with -ī as the old genitive ending; but the correct explanation is no doubt the one given above; cf Adoni-zedek in Josh 10 1, where LXX with Jgs 1 5-7 has Adonibezek. M. was king of Salem (= Jerus) and 'a priest unto 'El 'Elyōn' (Gen 14 18). He brought bread and wine to Abraham after the latter's victory over the kings, and also bestowed upon him the blessing of 'El 'Elyōn. Abraham gave him "a tenth of all," i.e. of the booty probably, unless it be of all his possessions. Gen 14 22 identifies Jeh with 'El 'Elyōn, the title of the Deity as worshipped at Jerus; and so He 7 1 ff, following LXX of Gen 14 18 ff, calls M. "priest of God Most High," i.e. Jeh.

Skinner (Gen, 271, where Jos, Ant, XVI, vi, 2, and Asm M 6 1 are cited) points out that the Maccabees were called "high priests of God most high." Hence some hold that the story of M. is an invention of Judaism, but Gunkel (Gen, 285 ff) maintains that he is a traditional, if not a historical, character.

Ps 110 4 makes the king-priest who is addressed there a virtual successor of M., and the kings of Jerus might well, as Gunkel suggests, have been considered successors of M. in the same way that Charlemagne was regarded as the successor of the Caesars, and the latter as successors of the Pharaohs in Egypt. This leads naturally to an early date being ascribed to Ps 110.

The thought of a priest after the order of M. is taken up by the author of He. He wanted to prove the claim of Christ to be called priest. It was impossible, even had he so wished, to consider Jesus as an Aaronic priest, for He was descended from the tribe of Judah and not from that of Levi (7 14). The words of Ps 110 4 are taken to refer to Him

TRADITIONAL. MEGIDDO—REINS OF PALACE AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS

(5 5 f), and in 7 5 ff the order of M. is held to be higher than that of Aaron, for the superiority of M. was acknowledged by Abraham (a) when he paid tithes to M. and (b) when he was blessed by M., for "the less is blessed of the better." It might be added that Jesus can be considered a priest after the order of M. in virtue of His descent from David, if the latter be regarded as successor to M. But the author of He does not explicitly say this. Further, Aaron is only a "type" brought forward in He to show the more excellent glory of the work of Jesus, whereas M. is "made like unto the Son of God" (7 3), and Jesus is said to be "after the likeness of Melchizedek" (7 15).

He 7 1 ff presents difficulties. Where did the author get the material for this description of M.? (1) M. is said to be "without father, without mother, [i.e.] without genealogy"; and (2) he is described as "having neither beginning of days nor end of life"; he "abideth a priest continually." The answer is perhaps to be had among the Am Tab, among which are at least 6, probably 8, letters from a king of Urusalim to Amenophis IV, king of Egypt, whose "slave" the former calls himself. Urusalim is to be identified with Jerus, and the letters belong to c 1400 BC. The name of this king is given as Abd-Khibā (or Abd-hība), though Hommel, quoted by G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 14, n. 7, reads Arad-Chība. Zimmer, in ZA, 1891, 246, says that it can be read Abditāba, and so Sayce (HDB, III, 335b) calls him 'Ebhedh töbh. The king tells his Egypt overlord, "Neither my father nor my mother set me in this place: the mighty arm of the king [or, according to Sayce, "the arm of the mighty king"] established me in my father's house" (Letter 102 in Berlin collection, ll. 9-13; also no. 103, ll. 25-28; no. 104, ll. 13-15; see, further, H. Winckler, Die Thontafeln von Tell-el-Amarna; Knudtzon, Beiträge zur Assyriologie, IV, 101 ff, 279 ff, cited by G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 8, n. 1).

It thus becomes clear that possibly tradition identified M. with Abd-Khibā. At any rate the idea that M. was "without father, without mother, [i.e.] without genealogy" can easily be explained if the words of Abd-Khibā concerning himself can have been also attributed to M. The words meant originally that he acknowledged that he did not come to the throne because he had a claim on it through descent; he owed it to appointment. But Jewish interpretation explained them as implying that he had no father or mother. Ps 110 4 had spoken of the king there as being "a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek," and this seems to have been taken to involve the perpetuity of M. also as priest. M. was then thought of as "having neither beginning of days" = "without father, without mother, without genealogy," and again as not having "end of life" = "abideth a priest continually." Hence he is "made like unto the son of God," having neither beginning of days nor end of life. We get another NT example of Jewish interpretation in Gal 4 21 ff. We have no actual proof that M. is identical with Abd-Khibā; possibly the reference to the former as being "without father," etc, is not to be explained as above. But why should M., and he alone, of all the OT characters be thought of in this way?

Westcott, He, 199, has a suggestive thought about M.: "The lessons of his appearance lie in the appearance itself. Abraham marks a new departure. . . . But before the fresh order is established we have a vision of the old in its superior majesty; and this, on the eve of disappearance, gives its blessing to the new."

On the references to M. in Philo see Westcott, op. cit., 201; F. Rendall, He, App. 58 ff; and esp (with the passages and other authorities cited there) G. Milligan, Theology of Ep. to the He, 203 ff.

The conclusions we come to are: (1) There was a tradition in Jerus of M., a king in pre-Israelitish times, who was also priest to 'El 'Elyōn. This is the origin of Gen 14 18 ff, where 'El 'Elyōn is identified with Jeh. (2) Ps 110 makes use of this tradition and the Psalmist's king is regarded as M.'s successor. (3) The Ep. to the He makes use of (a) Ps 110, which is taken to be a prophecy of Christ, (b) of Gen 14 18 ff, and (c) of oral tradition which was not found in the OT. It is this unwritten tradition that is possibly explained by the Am Tab. See, further, arts. by Sayce, Driver, and Hommel in Expos T, VII, VIII. See also JERUSALEM.

MELEA, mē'lē-a, mel'ē-a (Μελέα, Meleō): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3 31).

MELECH, mē'lek (מֶלֶךְ, melekh, "king"): Great-grandson of Jonathan, son of Saul, grandson of Mephibosheth or Meribbaal (1 Ch 8 35; 9 41).

MELICU, mel'i-kū (מְלִיכָה, mēlikhā, also מְלִיכָה, mēlikhā, "regnant"): Same as MALLUCHI (q.v.).

MELITA, mel'i-ta (Μελίτη, Melitē, Acts 28 1): Is now generally identified with Malta. The former error in attributing the reference to the island of Meleda on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea was due to the ancient practice of employing the term Adria to include the Ionian and Sicilian seas.

Malta is the largest of a group of islands including Gozo and the islets Comino, Cominotto and Filfla, lying about 56 miles from the southern extremity of Sicily, 174 from the mainland of Italy, and 187 from the African coast. Malta itself is 17½ miles long and 9½ broad, and contains an area of 95 sq. miles. Its modern capital, Valetta, is situated in 35° 54' N. lat. and 14° 31' E. long.

The central position of Malta in the Mediterranean Sea gave it great importance as a naval station. It was probably at first a Phoen colony, and later passed under the influence, if not domination, of the Sicilian Greeks. But the Romans captured it from the Carthaginians in 218 BC (Livy xxi.51) and attached it definitely to the province of Sicily. Under Rom rule the inhabitants were famous for their industry, esp. in the production of textile fabrics, probably of native cotton. The celebrated vestis melitensis was a fine and soft material for dresses and for the covering of couches (Cicero Verr. ii.72.176; ii.74.183; iv.46.103; Diodorus v.12.22). At the time when Paul visited the island it would seem that the administration was intrusted to a deputy of the praetor of Sicily, who is referred to as prōtos Melitaiōn (Acts 28 7; CIG, 5754), or Melitensium primus omnium (CIL, x, 7495) (see PUBLIUS). A bay 2½ miles N.W. of Valetta, the mouth of which is held by tradition to be the place where the vessel that bore Paul ran ashore, tallies admirably with the description of the locality in Acts. The Admiralty charts indicate places near the west side of the entrance to the bay, where the depth is first 20 ft. and then 15 ft., while the rush of the breakers in front of the little island of Salmoneta and behind it suit the reference to a place "where two seas met" (Acts 27 41). The inlet is called the Bay of St. Paul. The topographical question has been exhaustively treated by Ramsay in St. Paul the Traveller.

GEORGE H. ALLEN

MELODY, mel'ō-di: זִמְרָה, zīmrah, a musical piece or song to be accompanied by an instrument (Isa 61 3); an instrument of praise (Am 5 23); נָגַן, nāghan, "to play on a stringed instrument," "Make sweet melody, sing many songs" (Isa 23 16); ψάλλω, psállō, to celebrate the praises of God with music (Eph 5 19). See MUSIC.

MELONS, mel'unz (מֶלֶן, 'abhaññim; cf Arab. battikh, the "water melon"; πέπων, pépōnes): In Nu 11 5, the melon is referred to as common in Egypt, and there can be no doubt that the variety indicated is the watermelon (Citrullus vulgaris) which is indigenous in tropical Africa. It has been cultivated in Egypt since the earliest times.

MELZAR, mel'zār (מֶלְצָר, ha-melzar; LXX 'Αβιεσδρί, Abiesdri, Theod. B, 'Αμελσάδ, Hamel-sád): Possibly a transliteration of the Bab Amelu-usur, the officer to whom was intrusted the bringing-up of Daniel and his three companions (Dnl 1 11 AV, RV "the steward," m "Heb Hammelzar"). It has been suggested that the name is not the name of a person, but denotes the office of guardian, like the Bab maşşaru. In this case the l would come by dissimilation from the first of the two s sounds, which on its side has come from an assimilated n, the root being naşaru, "to protect," "to guard."

R. DICK WILSON

MEM, mām, mem (מֶם, ם): The 13th letter of the Heb alphabet, transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as m. It came also to be used for the number 40. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

MEMBER, mem'bēr ([1] מֶמְבֵּר, yāçur; μέλος, mēlos; [2] שְׂרָפָה, shāph'k'hāh, "membrum virile" [Dt 23 1]): The first Heb word is derived from a root meaning "to knead," "to mold in clay," "to create." It therefore denotes any feature or part of the body. "So the tongue also is a little member, and boasteth great things" (Jas 3 5). "The members" is equivalent with "the body" (which see; cf Ps 139 16 AV). The members are not self-governing, but execute the orders of the mind, obeying either the lower nature in the commission of sin or iniquity, unrighteousness and uncleanness (Rom 6 13,19), or following the higher nature, the Divine impulses in the fulfilling of the law of Christ (6 19).

By nature, the "law in my members" (Rom 7 23) is opposed to the better nature (Jas 4 1) until by "regeneration" (which see) this condition is changed, when the Spirit of Christ becomes the governing power, using our members, i.e. all our abilities, in the execution of His plans. This is not done while we remain passive, but only when we have actively presented or yielded our members to His service (Rom 6 19). Therefore our bodies must not be desecrated by baser uses (1 Cor 6 15,19,20). The Lord Jesus illustrates the severe discipline which is needed to subdue the members of even the regenerate to perfect submission under the higher law of the Spirit by the simile of the right eye, which is to be plucked out, and the right hand, which is to be cut off (Mt 5 29,30), and St. Paul speaks of putting to death (AV "mortifying") the "members which are upon the earth" (Col 3 5).

It is the difference in character and gifts of individual Christians which leads St. Paul to speak of the variety of members, which, though of manifold functions, are equally important to the completeness of the body. It is thus in the manifold variety of the body of Christ (1 Cor 12 12-27; Eph 4 16), and Christians being members of Christ, who is the head (Eph 1 22; 4 15; 5 23), are members one of another (Rom 12 5; Eph 4 25).

In Dt 23 1 the Israelitish Law against emasculation is referred to, and a religious disability is stated for the eunuch. Heathen Semites and other neighbors of Israel often castrated for religious purposes in the temple service of various divinities and for functions in princely palaces and harems. Heathen monarchs almost invariably had large numbers of these unfortunates, who frequently attained to positions of high power and responsibility. Herodotus states their frequent occurrence among the Persians (Hist. vi.32), and in the light of 2 K 20 18 and Dnl 1 3 it appears as not impossible that Daniel and his friends belonged to this class. In later years their existence is certain in Israel (1 S 8 15 RVm; Jer 38 7; Mt 19 12). See also CONCISION; ΕΥΝΟΥΧ.

H. L. E. LUEKING

MEMEROTH, mem'ē-roth (A, Μαμερόθ, Mare-rōth; B here omits Memeroth and two other names; AV Meremoth): A name in the genealogy of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2) = "Meraioth" in Ezr 7 3, also "Mari-moth" in 2 Esd 1 2.

MEMMIUS, mem'i-us, QUINTUS, kwin'tus (Κόιντος Μέμμιος, Kóintos Mēmios): One of the 2 Rom legates who bore a letter to the Jews after their victory over Lysias 163 BC (2 Macc 11 34). No Quintus Memmius is otherwise known to history, and no Memmius among the list of legates sent to Asia. Polybius (xxi.18) mentions a Quintus and a Canuleius as sent to Egypt, 162 BC, and again (xxxiii.15) the same Quintus as sent as an ambassador to Rhodes, 153 BC. A Titus Memmius had been an envoy of the senate to Achaia and Macedonia before the date of this letter (Livy xliii.5). None of these is likely to be the one referred to in 2 Macc 11 34, and it is possible that no such person was sent with the letter, which is spurious. See MANIUS. S. ANGUS

MEMORIAL, mē-mō'ri-al, MEMORY, mem'ō-ri (מִזְכָּרָה, 'azkārāh, זֵכֶר, zēkher, זָכָר, zekher, זִכְרֹן, zikkārōn; μνημόσυνον, mnēmósunon): "Memorial" as the tr of 'azkārāh is a sacrificial term, that which brings the offerer into remembrance before God, or brings God into favorable remembrance with the offerer; it is used of the burning of a portion of the meal offering, RV (AV "meat-offering"); better, cereal offering, on the altar (Lev 2 2, RV "as the memorial"; 2 9,16; 5 12, RV "as"; 24 7; Nu 5 26, RV "as"); as the tr of zēkher (zekher), zikkārōn, it is a memorial in the sense of a remembrance (zēkher, zekher, Ex 3 15; the memorial [name] of Jeh); hence we have in RV "memorial name" for "remembrance" (Ps 30 4 ARV; 97 12, ERV "holy name," m "Heb memorial"; 102 12; 135 13; Isa 26 8; Hos 12 5, ERV "memorial"); for "memorial" (Est 9 28; Ps 9 6, ARV "remembrance"); zikkārōn, "a remembrance" (Ex 12 14; 13 9; Lev 23 24; Nu 5 15 [of the meal offering]; Josh 4 7; Neh 2 20; Zec 6 14); the Passover feast was to be in this sense "a memorial . . . for ever" (Ex 12 14; 13 9); so also the sh'ma' (Dt 6 4 f); "memorial" occurs in Wisd 4 1 (mnēmōn), RV "memory"; 4 19; Eccl 45 1 (mnēmōsunon); 49 1; 1 Macc 3 7; 12 53, RV "memorial."

"Memorial" occurs in the NT as the tr of mnēmōsunon, "a token of remembrance" (Mt 26 13; Mk 14 9; Acts 10 4, "Thy prayers and thine alms are gone up for a memorial before God," which suggests the sense in which "memorial" was used in the sacrificial ritual, and also the "better sacrifices" of the new dispensation).

Memory is the tr of zēkher (zekher) (Ps 109 15; 145 7; Prov 10 7; Eccl 9 5; Isa 26 14, RV "remembrance"); it occurs also in 1 Macc 13 29; 2 Macc 7 20. Katēchō, "to have, or hold fast," is rendered in 1 Cor 15 2 AV "keep in memory," m "hold fast," ARV "hold fast," ERV "hold it fast," i.e. the word preached to them.

MEMPHIS, mem'fis: The ancient capital of Egypt, 12 miles S. of the modern Cairo. This Gr and Rom form of the name was derived

1. Name from the Coptic form Menfi (now Arab.

Menf), the abbreviation of the Egyp name Men-nofer, "the good haven." This name was applied to the pyramid of Pepy I, in the cemetery above the city; some have thought the city name to have been derived from the pyramid, but this is unlikely, as the city must have had a regular name before that. It may perhaps mean

"the excellence of Mena," its founder. It appears still more shortened in Hos (9 6) as Moph (mōph), and in Isa (19 13), Jer (2 16), and Ezk (30 13) as Noph (nōph).

The classical statements show that the city in Rom times was about 8 miles long and 4 miles wide, and the indications of the site agree with this. It was the sole capital of Egypt from the 1st to the XVIIth Dynasty; it shared supremacy with Thebes during the XVIIIth to XXVth Dynasties, and with Sais to the XXXth Dynasty. Alexandria then gradually obscured it, but the governor of Egypt signed the final capitulation to the Arabs in the old capital. While other cities assumed a political equality, yet commercially Memphis probably remained supreme until the Ptolemies.

The oldest center of settlement was probably the shrine of the sacred bull, Apis or Hapy, which was in the S. of the city. This worship was doubtless prehistoric, so that when the first king of all Egypt, Mena, founded his capital, there was already a nucleus. His great work was taking in land to the N., and founding the temple of the dynastic god Ptah, which was extended until its inclosure included as much as the great temple of Amon at Thebes, about 3 furlongs long and 2 furlongs wide. To the N. of this was the sacred lake; beyond that, the palace and camp. Gradually the fashionable quarters moved northward in Egypt, in search of fresher air; the rulers had moved 10 miles N. to Babylon by Rom times, then to Fostat, then Cairo, and lastly now to Abbasiyeh and Kubkeh, altogether a shift of 18 miles in 8,000 years.

After the shrine of Apis the next oldest center is that of Ptah, founded by Mena. This was recently cleared in yearly sections by the 4. Archaeo- British School, finding principally logical sculptures of the XVIIIth and XIXth Results Dynasties. The account of the north gate given by Herodotus, that it was built by Amenemhat III, has been verified by finding his name on the lintel. An immense sphinx of alabaster 26 ft. long has also been found. To the E. of this was the temple of the foreign quarter, the temple of King Proteus in Gr accounts, where foreign pottery and terracotta heads have been found. Other temples that are known to have existed in Memphis are those of Hathor, Neit, Amen, Imhotep, Isis, Osiris-Sokar, Khnumu, Bastel, Tahuti, Anubis and Sebek.

A large building of King Siamen (XXIst Dynasty) has been found S. of the Ptah temple. To the N. of the great temple lay the fortress, and in it the palace mound of the XXVIth Dynasty covered two acres. It has been completely cleared, but the lower part is still to be examined. The north end of it was at least 90 ft. high, of brickwork, filled up to half the height by a flooring raised on cellular brickwork. The great court was about 110 ft. square, and its roof was supported by 16 columns 45 ft. high.

The principal sights of Memphis now are the great colossus of Rameses II, the lesser colossus of the same, and the immense alabaster sphinx. The cemetery of the city is the most important in Egypt; it lies 2 miles to the W. on the desert, and is known as Saqqareh, from So-kar, the god of the dead. See SAQQAREH. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE

MEMUCAN, mē-mū'kan (מְמוּכָן, m'mūkhān; derivation unknown but probably of Pers origin [Est 1 14.16.21]): One of "the seven princes of Persia and Media, who saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom." Ahasuerus consults these men, as those "that knew law and judgment," as to the proper treatment of the rebellious Vashti. Memucan is the spokesman of the reply. He recommends Vashti's deposition so that "all the wives will give to their husbands honor, both to great and small." This advice is adopted and incorporated into a royal decree—with what success is not said.

MENAHM, men'a-hem (מְנַחֵם, m'nahēm, "one who comforts"; Manahm, Manahm; 2 K 15 14-22): Son of Gadi and 16th king of Israel. He reigned 10 years. Menahem was probably the officer in charge of the royal troops in Tirzah, one of the king's residences, at the time of the murder of Zechariah by Shallum. Hearing of the deed, he brought up his troops and avenged the death of his master by putting Shallum to death in Samaria. He then seized the vacant throne. His first full year may have been 758 BC (others, as seen below, put later).

The country at this time, as depicted by Hosea and Amos, was in a deplorable condition of anarchy and lawlessness. Menahem, with a strong hand, enforced his occupation of the throne. One town only seems to have refused to acknowledge him. This was Tiphseh, a place 6 miles S.W. of Shechem, now the ruined village of Khurbet Tafsah. As Menahem is said to have attacked this inclosed city from Tirzah, lying to its N., it is probable that he took it on the way to Samaria, before proceeding to do battle with Shallum. If this was so, it is some explanation of the cruelty with which he treated its inhabitants (ver 16). One such instance of severity was enough. The whole kingdom was at his feet. He proved to be a strong and determined ruler, and during the 9 or 10 years of his governorship had no further internecine trouble to contend with.

2. Early Acts But there was another source of disquiet. Assyria, under Pul, had resumed her advance to the W. and threatened the kingdoms of Palestine.

3. Mena- Menahem resolved on a policy of hem and diplomacy, and rather than risk a war with the conqueror of the East, agreed to the payment of a heavy tribute of 1,000 talents of silver. To raise this sum he had to assess his wealthier subjects to the extent of 50 shekels each. As there are 3,000 shekels in a talent of silver, it is obvious that some 60,000 persons, "mighty men of wealth," must have been laid under contribution in this levy—an indication at once of the enormity of the tribute, and of the prosperity of the country at the time. However short-sighted the policy, its immediate purpose was attained, which was that the hand of the Assyrian king "might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand" (ver 19).

A difficulty attaches to the dates of this period. The Pul of 2 K 15 19 and 1 Ch 5 26 is now identified with Tiglath-pileser III, who took this title on ascending the throne of Assyria in 745 BC. In an inscription of Tiglath-pileser, Menahem appears as Minehimmu Samarinā (Menahem the Samarian), together with Raṣunnu (Rezin) of Damascus and Hirāmu (Hiram) of Tyre. The date given to this inscription is 738 BC, whereas the last year we can give to Menahem is 749, or 10 years earlier.

The chronological difficulty which thus arises may be met in one of two ways. Either the inscription, like that on the black obelisk

5. Proposed Solutions of Kurkh (see JEHU), was written some years after the events to which it refers and contains records of operations in which Tiglath-pileser took part before he became king; or Pekah—who was on the throne of Israel in 738 (?)—is spoken of under the dynastic name Menahem, though he was not of his family. The former of these hypotheses is that which the present writer is inclined to adopt. (By others the dates of Menahem are lowered in conformity with the inscription; see CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT.)

Menahem attempted no reformation in the national religion, but, like all his predecessors, adhered to the worship of the golden calves. On this account, like them, he incurs the heavy censure of the historian.

MENAN, mē'nan. See MENNA.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN, mē'nē, mē'nē, tē'kel, ū-fār'sin, men'ā, men'ā, tek'el, ō-fār'sin (מֶנֶה מֶנֶה תְּקֵל וּפְרָסִין, m'nē' m'nē' tē'kēl ūpharsin; Theod., Μανη, θεκελ, φαρης, Manē, thekēl, pharēs): These are the words that, according to Daniel's reading, were inscribed on the walls of Belshazzar's palace and that caused the great commotion on the occasion of his last feast (Dnl 5 25). As the only authority that we have for the reading is that of Daniel, it seems but fair that the interpretation of the terms be left to the person who gave us the text. According to his interpretation, there is a double sense to be found in the three different words of the inscription (Dnl 5 26–28).

M'nē', which, however it is pointed, must be taken from the verb m'nāh (Heb mānāh; Bab manu), is said to have indicated that God had numbered (the days of) Belshazzar's kingdom and finished it (or delivered it up). Both of these meanings can be shown to be proper to the √ m'nāh.

Tē'kēl, on the contrary, is interpreted as coming from two roots: the first, t'kal, "to weigh," and the second, kal, "to be light or wanting" (Heb kālāl; Bab kālālu).

P'rēs (or paršin) also is interpreted as coming from two roots: first, p'raś, "to divide" (Heb pāras or pārash; Bab pārasu), and the second as denoting the proper name Pāraś, "Persia." Thus interpreted, the whole story hangs together, makes good sense, and is fully justified by the context and by the language employed. If the original text was in Bab, the signs were ambiguous; if they were in Aram., the consonants alone were written, and hence the reading would be doubtful. In either case, the inscription was apparent but not readable, except by Daniel with the aid of God, through whom also the seer was enabled to give the proper interpretation. That Daniel's interpretation was accepted by Belshazzar and the rest shows that the interpretation of the signs was reasonable and convincing when once it had been made. We see, therefore, no good reason for departing from the interpretation that the Book of Dnl gives as the true one.

As to the interpretation of the inscription, it makes no difference whether the signs represented a mina, a shekel, and two perases, as has been recently suggested by M. Clermont-Ganneau. In this case the meaning was not so apparent, but the puns, the play upon the sounds, were even better. We doubt, however, if it can be shown that t'kel means shekel. On the old Aram. documents of Egypt and Assyria, it is with one exception spelled shekel. In the Tg of Onkelos, shekel is always rendered by ḡēla'; in the Pesh and Arab. VSS, by mathkal; in the Samaritan Tg, by mathkal (except only perhaps in Gen 23 16, where we have ethkel). In the Tg of Onkelos, wherever tiḡlā' occurs, it translates the Heb beḡa' (Gen 24 22 and Ex 38 26 only). M'nē', to be sure, may have meant the mina, and p'rēs, the half-mina. The pārāsh is mentioned in the inscription of Panammu and in an Aram. inscription on an Assyrian weight. Besides this, it is found in the New Heb of the Mish. It is not found, however, in the Tg of Onkelos, nor in Syr, nor in the OT Heb; nor in the sense of half-shekel in the Aram. papyri. While, then, it may be admitted that Daniel may have read, "A mina, a mina, a shekel, and two half-minas," it is altogether unlikely, and there is certainly no proof that he did. Yet, if he did, his punning interpretations were justified by the usage of ancient oracles and interpreters of signs, and also by the event.

MENELAUS, men-ē-lā'us (Μενέλαος, Menēlaos): According to the less likely account of Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1; XV, iii, 1; XX, x, 3), Menelaus was a brother of Jason and Onias III, and his name was really Onias. But it is very unlikely that there should be two brothers of the same name. The account of 2 Macc is more credible—that Menelaus was the brother of the notorious Simon who suggested to the Syrians the plundering of the temple; he was thus of the tribe of Benjamin (2 Macc 4 23; cf with 3 4) and not properly eligible to the high-priesthood. He was intrusted by Jason (171 BC), who had supplanted Onias, with contributions to the king of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, and by outbidding Jason in presents he secured the office of high priest for himself (4 23 f), 171 BC. Menelaus returned with "the passion of a cruel tyrant" to Jerus, and Jason fled. But as Menelaus failed to pay the promised amount, both he and Sostratus, the governor, were summoned to appear before the king. Lysimachus, the brother of Menelaus, was left at Jerus in the meantime as deputy high priest. The king was called from his capital to suppress an insurrection of Tarsus and Mallus. Menelaus took advantage of his absence to win over Andronicus, the king's deputy, by rich presents stolen from the temple. For this sacrilege Onias III sharply reproved him and fled to a sanctuary, Daphne, near Antioch. Andronicus was then further persuaded by Menelaus to entice Onias from his retreat and murder him (4 34 f)—an act against which both Jews and Greeks protested to the king on his return, and secured deserved punishment for Andronicus. Meanwhile, the oppression of Lysimachus, abetted by Menelaus, caused a bloody insurrection in Jerus, in connection with which a Jewish deputation brought an accusation against Menelaus on the occasion of Antiochus' visit to Tyre. Menelaus bribed Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, to win over the king to acquit himself and secure the execution of "those hapless men, who, if they had pleaded even before Scythians, would have been discharged uncondemned" (4 39 f). Menelaus returned in triumph to his office. But Jason, taking advantage of Epiphanes' absence in Egypt and a false rumor of his death, made a bloody but unsuccessful attempt upon the city, in order to secure his office again; his rival took refuge in the citadel. The king returned in fury, caused a three days' slaughter of the citizens, rifled the temple with Menelaus as guide, and left him as one of his agents to keep the Jews in subjection (2 Macc 5 1 ff). He appears next and for the last time in the reign of Eupator in 162 BC. Lysias, the king's chancellor, accused him to the king as the cause of all the troubles in Judaea (2 Macc 13 3-8). Eupator caused him to be brought to Beroea and there—before, according to 2 Macc, loc. cit., or after, according to Jos, Ant. XII, ix, 7, the invasion of Judaea by Eupator and Lysias—to be put to death by being flung from the top of a high tower into the ashes of which it was full—a fitting end for such a wretch.

MENESTHEUS, mē-nēs'thūs, mē-nēs'thē-us (Μενεσθέως, Menestheús, A, Μενεσθεύς, Menestheús): The father of Apollonius, a general of Epiphanes (2 Macc 4 21 and in 2 Macc 4 4 RV, following a conjecture of Hort [Μενεσθῆς, Menesthēs, for μαίνεσθαι ēws, mainesthai hēōs; the latter is retained in Swete and Fritzsche]). "Son of Menestheus" is added to distinguish this Apollonius from "A. son of Thrasaeus" (2 Macc 3 5) and "A. son of Gennaesus" (12 2). See APOLLONIUS.

MENI, mē'ni: Destiny, a god of Good Luck, possibly the Pleiades (Isa 65 11 m). See ASTROLOGY, 10; GAD.

MENNA, men'a (Μεννά, Menná, WH, Treg., Tisch.; Μαῦνάν, Maunán, TR; AV Menan): An ancestor of Jesus, a great-grandson of David (Lk 3 31).

MENUHAH, men-ū'hā (מְנוּחָה, mēnūhāh, "place of rest"; AV Menuchah, men-ū'kā): Rendered in Jgs 20 43 AV "with ease," RV "at their resting-place." Both, however, have a marginal suggestion which would make the word a place-name, which would then more naturally read "from Nuhah over against Gibeah," thus describing the ground over which the slaughter of the Benjamites occurred. In 1 Ch 8 2 the word "Nohah" occurs as that of a Benjamite clan. The place intended is perhaps MANAHATH (q.v.).

MENUHOTH, men-ū'hoth (מְנוּחֹת, mēnūhōth, "dwellings"; AV מְנוּחָתַי, mānāhtī, Manahethites): The first form is the RV transliterated in the name; the second form is AV retained by RV in the passages where the word occurs (1 Ch 2 52; cf ver 54). The people here spoken of by AV as "half of the Manahethites" are mentioned as descendants of Salma (ver 54), while those mentioned as Menuhoh are mentioned as descendants of Judah through Shobal, father of Kiriath-jearim. Both words are from the same root. AV keeps the same designation for both passages, while RV has marked the difference in spelling by changing the first passage and following AV in the second. Both sections of the family belong to the clan Caleb, and it would seem that they became the dominant people in the otherwise unknown town of Manahath, so that it came to be regarded as belonging to Judah. It may be connected with the Menuchah (RV "Menuhah") suggested as a place-name in Jgs 20 43 m. In the LXX between vs 59 and 60 of Josh ch 15 the names of 11 cities are inserted, among them being a Mancho whose Heb equivalent gives the word. It is difficult to identify, and the Vulg cuts the knot by translating "dimidium requietionum"! See MANAHATH.

MEONENIM, mē-on'ē-nim, mē-ō'nē-nim, OAK OF: מְעֹנִיִּים, 'ēlōn mē'ōnēnim; B, Ἰλωναμαυμελιν, Ēlōnmaōnemēin, A, δρυὸς ἀποβλαπόντων, dryōs apoblēpōntōn; AV Plain of): This was a sacred tree which apparently could be seen from the gate of Shechem (Jgs 9 37). No doubt it took its name from the soothsayers who sat under it, practising augury, etc. Several times mention is made of sacred trees in the vicinity of Shechem (Gen 35 4; Josh 24 26; Jgs 9 6, etc.). Where this tree stood is not known. See AUGURS' OAK.

MEONOTHAI, mē-on'ō-thī, mē-ō'nō-thī, mē-ō'nō'thī (מְעֹנוֹתַי, mē'ōnōthai, "my dwellings"): A son of Othniel, nephew of Caleb (1 Ch 4 14). Possibly, as AVm suggests, and the Vulg and Complutensian LXX say, vs 13.14 should read "the sons of Othniel, Hathath and Meonothai; and Meonothai begat Ophrah," etc. The latter may be founder of the town of that name.

MEPHAATH, mēf'ā-ath, mē-fā'ath (מִפְצָה, mēpha'ath, מִפְצָה, mōpha'ath; B, Μαμφάαθ, Maipháath, Mēpháath): A city of the Amorites in the territory allotted to Reuben, named with Kedemoth and Kiriathaim (Josh 13 18), and given to the Merarite Levites (21 37; 1 Ch 6 79). It appears again as a Moabite town in Jer 48 21. It was known to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom) as occupied by a Rom garrison, but the site has been lost.

MEPHIBOSHETH, mē-fib'ō-sheth (מִפְּיבֹשֶׁת, mēphibōsheth, "idol-breaker," also MERIB-BAAL [q.v.]; Μεμφιβόσθε, Memphibōsthe):

(1) Son of Saul by his concubine RIZPAH (q.v.), daughter of Aiah (2 S 21 8). See also ARMONI.

(2) Grandson of Saul, son of Jonathan, and nephew of Mephibosheth (1) (2 S 4 4). He was 5 years old when his father and grandfather were slain. He was living in charge of a nurse, possibly because his mother was dead. Tidings of the disaster at Jezreel and the onswep of the Philis terrified the nurse. She fled with her charge in such haste that a fall lamed the little prince in both feet for life. His life is a series of disasters, disappointments, and anxieties. It is a weary, broken, dispirited soul that speaks in all his utterances. The nurse carried him to Lo-debar among the mountains of Gilead, where he was brought up by Machir, son of Ammiel (2 S 9 4). There he evidently married, for he had a son Mica when he returned later at David's request. When David had settled his own affairs and subdued his enemies, he turned his inquiries to Saul's household to see whether there were any survivors to whom he might show kindness for Jonathan's sake (2 S 9 1). The search caused the appearance of Ziba, a servant of Saul's house (ver 2), who had meanwhile grown prosperous by some rapid process which can only be guessed at (vs 9.10). From him David learned about Mephibosheth, who was sent for. His humble bearing was consistent with his chronically broken spirit. David put Ziba's property (which had belonged to Saul) at Mephibosheth's disposal and made Ziba steward thereof. Mephibosheth was also to be a daily guest at David's table (2 S 9 11-13). Seventeen years pass, during which Mephibosheth seems to have lived in Jerus. Then came Absalom's rebellion. David determined to flee, so distraught was he by the act of his son. At the moment of flight, in great depression and need, he was opportunely met by Ziba with food, refreshment and even means for travel. Naturally, the king inquired for Ziba's master. The treacherous reply was made (2 S 16 1-4) that Mephibosheth had remained behind for his own ends, hoping the people would give him, Saul's grandson, the kingdom. David believed this and restored to Ziba the property lost. Not till many days after did the lame prince get his chance to give David his own version of the story. He met David on his return from quelling Absalom's rebellion. He had not dressed his feet, trimmed his beard nor washed his clothes since the hour of David's departure (2 S 19 24). At David's anxious request Mephibosheth told his story: his servant had deceived him; he wanted to go with David, had even asked for his beast to be saddled; but Ziba had left him, and had slandered him to the king. But he would not plead his cause any more; David is "as an angel of God"; whatever he decides will be well! (2 S 19 26,27). Thus characteristically continued the speech of this lame, broken, humble man, son of a proud family (ver 28). David wearily settled the matter by dividing the property between the prince and his servant, the prince expressing utmost content that Ziba should take all so long as David remained friendly (vs 29,30). That David accepted Mephibosheth's explanation and was drawn out in heart toward the character of the broken man is shown by the fact that when some expiation from Saul's household was considered necessary to turn away the famine sent by an offended deity, Mephibosheth is spared when other members of Saul's household were sacrificed (2 S 21 7). The character of Mephibosheth well illustrates the effect of continued disaster, suspicion and treachery upon a sensitive mind.

MERAB, mē'rab (מֶרָב, mērabh, "increase"; Μεράβ, Merób): The elder daughter of Saul (1 S 14 49), promised, though not by name, to the man who should slay the Phili Goliath (1 S 17 25). David did this and was afterward taken by Saul to court (1 S 18 2), where he was detained in great honor. Merab was not, however, given to him as quickly as the incident would lead one to expect, and the sequel showed some unwillingness on the part of some persons in the contract to complete the promise. The adulation of the crowd who met David on his return from Phili warfare and gave him a more favorable ascription than to Saul (1 S 18 6-16) awoke the angry jealousy of Saul. He "eyed David from that day and forward" (ver 9). Twice David had to "avoid" the "evil spirit" in Saul (ver 11). Saul also feared David (ver 12), and this led him to incite the youth to more dangerous deeds of valor against the Philis by a renewed promise of Merab. He will have David's life, but rather by the hand of the Philis than his own (ver 17). Merab was to be the bait. But now another element complicated matters—Michal's love for David (ver 20), which may have been the retarding factor from the first. At any rate Merab is finally given to Adriel the Meholathite (ver 19). The passage in 2 S 21 8 doubtless contains an error—Michal's name occurring for that of her sister Merab—though the LXX, Jos, and a consistent Heb text all perpetuate it, as well as the concise meaning of the Heb word Yāladh, which is a physiological word for bearing children, and cannot be trad "brought up." A Tg explanation reads: "The 5 sons of Merab (which Michal, Saul's daughter brought up) which she bare," etc. Another suggestion reads the word "sister" after Michal in the possessive case, leaving the text otherwise as it stands. It is possible that Merab died comparatively young, and that her children were left in the care of their aunt, esp. when it is said she herself had none (2 S 6 23). The simplest explanation is to assume a scribal error, with the suggestion referred to as a possible explanation of it. The lonely Michal (2 S 6 20-23) became so identified with her (deceased) sister's children that they became, in a sense, hers. HENRY WALLACE

MERIAIAH, mē-rā'ya, mē-rī'a (מְרִיאָה, mēriyāh, "contumacious"): A priest in the time of Joiakim son of Jeshua, and head of the priestly house of Eraiah to which Ezra belonged (Neh 12 12; cf Ezr 7 1).

MERAIOTH, mē-rā'yoth, mē-rī'ōth (מְרִיאוֹת, mēriyōth): The name varies much in the Gr.

(1) A Levite, a descendant of Aaron (1 Ch 6 6 f; Ezr 7 3), called "Memeroth" in 1 Esd 8 2; and "Marimoth" in 2 Esd 1 2.

(2) The son of Ahitub and father of Zadok (1 Ch 9 11).

(3) A priestly house of which, in the days of Joiakim, Helkai was head (Neh 12 15). In ver 3 the name is given as "Meremoth."

MERAN, mē'ran. See MERRAN.

MERARI, mē-rā'ri (מְרָרִי, mērārī, "bitter"; Μαράρι, Marareī):

(1) The 3d son of Levi, his brothers, Gershon and Kohath, being always mentioned together with him (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16 ff). He was among those 70 who went down to Egypt with Jacob (Gen 46 8,11; cf ver 26 and Ex 1 5).

(2) The family of Merari, descendants of above, and always—with one exception, for which see MERARITES—spoken of as "sons of Merari" in numerous references, such as 1 Ch 6 1.16.19.29, which only repeat without additional information the references to be found in the body of this article. We early find them divided into two families, the Mahli and Mushi (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 17.20 33). At the exodus they numbered, under their chief Zurriel, 6,200, and they were assigned the north side of the tabernacle as a tenting-place (Nu 3 34.35), thus sharing in the honor of those who immediately surrounded the tabernacle—the south side being given to the Kohathites, the west to the Gershonites, and the east—toward the sun-rising—being reserved for Moses, Aaron and his sons (Nu 3 23.29.35.38). To the Merarites was entrusted the care of the boards, bars, pillars, sockets, vessels, pins and cords of the tabernacle (Nu 3 36.37; 4 29-33). They and the Gershonites were "under the hand" of Ithamar, son of Aaron, the sons of Gershon having charge of the softer material of the tabernacles—curtains, covers, hangings, etc (Nu 3 25.26). When reckoned by the number fit for service, i.e. between 30 and 50 years, the sons of Merari were 3,200 strong (Nu 4 42-45). Because of the weight of the material in their charge they were allowed 4 wagons and 8 oxen for carriage (Nu 7 8). In marching, when the tabernacle was taken down, the standard of Judah went first (Nu 10 14); then followed the Merarites bearing the tabernacle (ver 17), and after them came the standard of Reuben (ver 18). After the settlement in Canaan they had 12 cities assigned them out of Gad, Reuben and Zebulun (Josh 21 7.34-40; 1 Ch 6 63.77-81), just as the other two branches of Levi's family had their 12 cities respectively assigned out of the other tribes (Josh 21). The names of these Merarite cities are given (loc. cit.), and among them is Ramoth-gilead, one of the cities of refuge (ver 38). It is evident from 1 Ch 6 44-47; 16 41; 25 1.3.6.9.11.15.19.21 f; cf 15 6.17-19 that they had charge under Ethan or Jeduthun of the temple music in the service. In David's time Asaiah was their chief (1 Ch 15 6). Himself and 220 of the family helped David to bring up the Ark. David divided the Levites into courses among the Gershonites, Kohathites and Merarites (1 Ch 23 6; cf vs 21-23; 24 26-30). The functions of certain Merarites are described in 1 Ch 26 10-19. They also took part in cleansing the temple in Hezekiah's time (2 Ch 29 12) as well as in the days of Josiah (2 Ch 34 12), helping to repair the house of the Lord. Among the helpers of Ezra, too, we find some of them numbered (Ezr 8 18,19). The family seems to have played a very important part in keeping steady and true such faithfulness as remained in Israel.

(3) The father of Judith (Jth 8 1; 16 7).

MERARITES, mē-rā'rīts (מְרָרִית, m'rārī, "bitter"): The descendants of MERARI (q.v.), son of Levi. The only place where this form of the word occurs is Nu 26 57. Elsewhere they are always referred to as "sons of Merari."

MERATHAIM, mer-a-thā'im (מֶרְתַּיִם, m'rā-thayim, "double rebellion"): A name used for Babylon in Jer 50 21. According to Delitzsch it may be equivalent to the Bab Marratūn, i.e. land by the nar Marratu, "the bitter river" (Pers Gulf) = Southern Babylonia (OHL, s.v.).

MERCHANDISE, mūr'chan-diz ([1] מַעֲרָה, 'amar, [2] סָחַר, ṣaḥar, [3] שָׁחַר, ṣaḥar, [4] שְׁחֹרָה, ṣ'hōrāh, [5] רִכְלָה, r'khullāh, [6] מַעֲרָב, ma'ārābh, [7] מַרְכָּלֶת, markōleth; [8] ἐμπορία, emporía, [9] ἐμπορίον, empōrion, [10] γόμος, gōmos): There seem to be 4 distinct meanings of the word according to RV, viz.: (1) The products, i.e. goods or things sold or exchanged, and so merchandise in the present-day usage: (a) ṣaḥar is tr<sup>d</sup> thus in Prov 31 18; Isa 23 18; (b) ṣaḥar is tr<sup>d</sup> thus in Isa 45 14; these two are from a √ meaning to travel about as a peddler; (c) r'khullāh, tr<sup>d</sup> thus in Ezk 26 12, from a √ meaning to travel for trading purposes; (d) ma'ārābh, tr<sup>d</sup> thus in Ezk 27 9,27,33,34, from a √ meaning to intermix, to barter; (e) markōleth, tr<sup>d</sup> thus in Ezk 27 24 (the above 5 Heb words are all used to designate the goods or wares which were bartered); (f) 'amar, occurring in Dt 21 14; 24 7, tr<sup>d</sup> in AV "make merchandise of," but in RV "deal with as a slave," or RVM "deal with as a chattel"; (g) emporía, tr<sup>d</sup> "merchandise" in Mt 22 5; (h) empōrion, likewise in Jn 2 16 (the same Gr word is used in 2 Pet 2 3 for ARV "make merchandise of you"); (i) gōmos, "merchandise," in "cargo."

(2) The process of trade itself, i.e. the business: r'khullāh has in it the √ meaning of itinerant trading, and so in Ezk 28 16 the correct tr is not "merchandise," as in AV, but "traffic," "abundance of thy traffic," i.e. doing a thriving business: "trade was good."

(3) The place of trading, i.e. emporium, mart, etc: ṣ'hōrāh in Ezk 27 15 is tr<sup>d</sup> "mart." In Jn 2 16 reference is made to the "house of merchandise."

(4) The profits of trading: In Prov 3 14, ṣaḥar is tr<sup>d</sup> "gaining." Referring to wisdom, "For the gaining of it is better than the gaining of silver, and the profit thereof than fine gold"; AV "merchandise."

MERCHANT, mūr'chant, MERCHANTMAN, mūr'chant-man. See COMMERCE; MERCHANDISE; TRADE.

MERCURY, mūr'kū-ri, MERCURIUS, mēr-kū-ri-us: The tr of Ἑρμῆς, Hermēs, in Acts 14 12: "They called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercury, because he was the chief speaker." Hermes was the god of eloquence (and also of theft), the attendant, messenger and spokesman of the gods. The more commanding presence of Barnabas (cf 2 Cor 10 10) probably caused him to be identified with Zeus (the Rom Jupiter), while his gift of eloquence suggested the identification of Paul with Hermes (the Rom Mercury). The temple of Jupiter was before Lystra, and to him the Lycaonians paid their chief worship. Cf the legend of Baucis and Philemon (Ovid, Metam. viii.611 f) and see HERMES; JUPITER; GREECE, RELIGION IN. M. O. EVANS

MERCY, mūr'si, MERCIFUL, mūr'si-fōōl (רַחֲמִים, raḥam, רַחֲמָן, raḥmān; ἔλεος, eleos, ἔλεω, eleō, οἰκτιρμός, oiktirmós): "Mercy" is a distinctive Bible word characterizing God as revealed to men.

In the OT it is oftenest the tr of hesedh, "kindness," "loving-kindness" (see LOVINGKINDNESS), but raḥāmim, lit. "bowels" (the sympathetic region), and raḥmān, "to be inclined to," "to be gracious," are also frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "mercy"; eleos, "kindness," "beneficence," and eleō, "to show kindness," are the chief words rendering "mercy" in the NT; oiktirmós, "pity," "compassion," occurs a few times, also oiktirmōn, "pitiful," eleēmōn, "kind," "compassionate," twice; hileōs, "forgiving," and antileōs, "not forgiving," "without mercy," once each (He 8 12; Jas 2 13).

(1) Mercy is (a) an essential quality of God (Ex 34 6,7; Dt 4 31; Ps 62 12, etc); it is His delight (Mic 7 18,20; Ps 52 8); He is "the Father of mercies" (2 Cor 1 3), "rich in mercy" (Eph 2 4), "full of pity, and merciful" (Jas 5 11); (b) it is associated with forgiveness (Ex 34 7; Nu 14 18; 1 Tim 1 13,16); (c) with His forbearance (Ps 145 8, "Jeh is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great lovingkindness"; cf Rom 2 4; 11 32); (d) with His covenant (1 K 8 23; Neh 1 5), with His justice (Ps 101 1), with His faithfulness (Ps 89 24), with His truth (Ps 108 4); mercy and truth are united in Prov 3 3; 14 22, etc (in Ps 85 10 we have "Mercy and truth are met together"); (e) it goes forth to all (Ps 145 9, "Jeh is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works"; cf ver 16, "Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing," RVM "satisfiest every living thing with favor"); (f) it shows itself in pitying help (Ex 3 7; Ezr 9 9 f), supremely in Christ and His salvation (Lk 1 50,54,58; Eph 2 4); (g) it is abundant, practically infinite (Ps 86 5,15; 119 64); (h) it is everlasting (1 Ch 16 34, 41; Ezr 3 11; Ps 100 5; 136 repeatedly).

(2) "Mercy" is used of man as well as of God, and is required on man's part toward man and beast (Dt 25 4; Ps 37 21; 109 16; Prov 12 10; Dnl 4 27; Mic 6 8; Mt 5 7, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy"; 25 31-46; Lk 6 36, "Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful"; 10 30 f, the Good Samaritan; 14 12-16; Jas 3 17).

(3) In the NT "mercy" (eleos, usually the LXX tr of hesedh) is associated with "grace" (charis) in the apostolical greetings and elsewhere. Trench points out that the difference between them is that the freeness of God's love is the central point of charis, while eleos has in view misery and its relief; charis is His free grace and gift displayed in the forgiveness of sins—extended to men as they are guilty; His eleos (is extended to them) as they are miserable. The lower creation may be the object of His mercy (eleos), but man alone of His grace (charis); he alone needs it and is capable of receiving it (Synonyms of the NT, 163 f).

(4) From all the foregoing it will be seen that mercy in God is not merely His pardon of offenders, but His attitude to man, and to the world generally, from which His pardoning mercy proceeds. The frequency with which mercy is enjoined on men is specially deserving of notice, with the exclusion of the unmerciful from sonship to the all-merciful Father and from the benefits of His mercifulness. Shakespeare's question, "How canst thou hope for mercy rendering none?" is fully warranted by Our Lord's teaching and by Scripture in general; cf esp. the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18 21-35).

(5) As the rule, ARV has "lovingkindness" for "mercy" when hesedh is used of God, and "kindness" when it is used of men in relation to each other. "Compassion" (tr of rāham) is also in several instances substituted for "mercy" (Isa 9 17; 14 1; 27 11; Jer 13 14; 30 18), also "goodness" (tr of hesedh referring to man) (Hos 4 1; 6 6).

MERCY-SEAT, mûr'si-sêt, THE (מִסְפָּה, kap-pôrelh; NT ἡλῆστῆριον, hīlastērion, He 9 5): The name for the lid or covering of the ark of the covenant (Ex 25 17, etc.). The OT term means "covering," then, like the NT word, "propitiatory" (cf kippēr, "to cover guilt," "to make atonement"). The ark contained the two tables of stone which witnessed against the sin of the people. The blood of sacrifice, sprinkled on the mercy-seat on the great day of atonement, intercepted, as it were, this condemning testimony, and effected reconciliation between God and His people. See ATONEMENT; ATONEMENT, DAY OF; PROPITIATION; ARK OF COVENANT. In Rom 3 25, Jesus is said to be set forth as "a propitiation [lit. "propitiatory"], through faith, in his blood," thus fulfilling the idea of the mercy-seat (cf He 9 5.7.11.12, etc.).

MERED, mē'reḏ (מֵרֵד, meredh, "rebellion"; LXX has at least four variants in 1 Ch 4 17.18): A descendant of Judah through Caleb, and mentioned as a "son of Ezrah" (ver 17).

RV, rightly following the orthography of the Heb which has here hē (ה) instead of 'āleph (א), as in the name of the well-known Ezra, saves us from confusing this Ezrah with the other by giving him the correct terminal letter. Moreover, even if the question of spelling were waived, the absence of the mention of children in any known passages of the life of the scribe Ezra should settle the question, since this passage (ver 17) is associated with progeny.

A difficulty meets us in ver 18, where Mered is mentioned as taking to wife "Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh." That Pharaoh is not the proper name of some individual but the official title of Egypt's sovereign seems evident from the fact that AVm and RV text agree in translating the other wife of Mered as "the Jewess," rather than as a proper name Jehudijah, as if to distinguish the "Jewess" from the Egyptian. Probably "Hodiah" also is a corruption of Jehudijah in ver 19, and should be tr<sup>d</sup> again "the Jewess." Tgs and traditions have so changed and transposed and "interpreted" this passage that a sufficiently confused text has become worse confounded, and the only solid fact that emerges is that once a comparatively obscure Judahite (though the founder of several towns—Gedor, Soc, Eshtemoa, etc, ver 18) married an Egypt princess, whether as a captive or a freewoman we do not know. See BITHIAH. HENRY WALLACE

MEREMOTH, mer'ē-moth, me-rē'moth (מֵרְמוֹת, m'rēmōth, "heights"; Μερεμῶθ, Mereimōth):

(1) Son of Uriah (Ezr 8 33), who was head of the 7th course of priests appointed by David (1 Ch 24 10, Hakkoz=Koz; cf Neh 3 4.21). The family of Koz were among those unable to prove their pedigree on the return from Babylon, and were therefore deposed as polluted (Ezr 2 61.62). Meremoth's division of the family must, however, have been scatheless, for he is employed in the temple after the return as weigher of the gold and the vessels (Ezr 8 33), a function reserved for priests alone (Ezr 8 24-28). He takes a double part in the reconstruction under Nehemiah, first as a builder of the wall of the city (Neh 3 4), then as a restorer of that part of the temple abutting on the house of Eliashib the priest (Neh 3 21); "Marmoth" in 1 Esd 8 62.

(2) A member of the house of Bani, and, like so many of that house, among those who married and put away foreign wives (Ezr 10 36). He seems to be named Carabasion (!) in the corresponding list of 1 Esd 9 34.

(3) The name occurs in Neh 10 5 among those who "seal the covenant" with Nehemiah (Neh 10 1). It may there be the name of an individual (in which case there were 4 of the name), or it may be a family name. Certainly a "Meremoth" came back under Zerubbabel 100 years before (Neh 12 3), and the signatory in question may be either a descendant of the same name or a family representative. The name recurs later in the same list (Neh 12 15) as "Meraioth" through a scribal error confusing the two Heb letters yōdh and hōlem for mem. A comparison of Neh 12 1-3 and 12-15 shows clearly that it is the same person. Note that in ver 15 "Helkai" is the name of the contemporary leader.

(4) For Meremoth (1 Esd 8 2 AV), see MEME-ROTH.

MERIBAH, mer'i-bā, me-rū'bā. See MASSAH AND MERIBAH.

MERIB-BAL, mer-ib-bā'al (מֵרִיב-בַּא'ל, m'rīb-ba'al; also מֵרִיב-בַּא'ל, m'rī-bha'al, "Baal contends"): The spelling varies in a single verse; 1 Ch 9 40 contains the name twice: first, in the first form above; second, in the second form. The name is given also in 1 Ch 8 34. It is the other name of MEPIBOSHETH (2) (q.v.).

In Jer 11 13 and Hos 9 10 the terms "Baal" and "Bosheth" seem to stand in apposition, the latter form being a slightly contemptuous alternative rendered "shame." This is akin to other like changes, such as Esh-baal for Ish-bosheth, Jerub-besheth for Jerub-baal, etc. The change in the first part of the name could occur through a clerical confusion of aspirate pē and rēsh in Hebrew.

HENRY WALLACE

MERIBATH-KADESH, mer'i-bath-kā'desh, MERIBOTH-KADESH, mer'i-both-k. (Ezk 48 28; 47 19): The southern limit of Ezekiel's ideal land of Israel. See MERIBAH.

MERODACH, mē-rō'dak, mer'ō-dak (מֵרֹדַךְ, m'rōdhākh): The supreme deity of the Babylonians (Jer 50 2); the Nimrod of Gen 10 8-12; and among the constellations, Orion. See ASTRONOMY, II, 11; BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF; NIMROD.

MERODACH-BALADAN, mē-rō'dak-bal'a-dan, mer'ō-dak-b. (מֵרֹדַךְ בִּלְדָן, m'rō'dhakh bal'ā-dhān; Μαρδοάχ Βαλαδάν, Marōdāch Baladān): The son of Baladan, is mentioned in Isa 39 1, as a king of Babylon who sent an embassy to Hezekiah, king of Judah, apparently shortly after the latter's illness, in order to congratulate him on his recovery of health, and to make with him an offensive and defensive alliance. This Merodach-baladan was a king of the Chaldeans of the house of Yakin, and was the most dangerous and inveterate foe of Sargon and his son Sennacherib, kings of Assyria, with whom he long and bitterly contested the possession of Babylon and the surrounding provinces. M.-b. seems to have seized Babylon immediately after the death of Shalmaneser in 721 BC; and it was not till the 12th year of his reign that Sargon succeeded in ousting him. From that time down to the 8th campaign of Sennacherib, Sargon and his son pursued with relentless animosity M.-b. and his family until at last his son Nabushumishkun was captured and the whole family of M.-b. was apparently destroyed. According to the monuments, therefore, it was from a worldly point of view good politics for Hezekiah and his western allies to come to an understanding with M.-b. and the Aramaeans, Elamites, and others, who were confederated with him. From a strategical point of view, the weakness of the allied powers consisted in the fact that the Arabian desert lay between the eastern and western members of the confederacy, so that the Assyrian kings were able to attack their enemies when they pleased and to defeat them in detail.

MEROM, mē'rom, WATERS OF (מֵרֹם, mē-mērōm; ὕδωρ Μαρρών or Μερρών, hūdōr Marrōn or Merrōn): The place which was the scene of Joshua's victory over Jabin and his confederates (Josh 11 7), commonly identified with Lake Huleh in the upper part of the Jordan valley, but with doubtful propriety. Jos says (Ant. V, i, 18) that the camp of the allies was at Beroth in upper Waters of Merom.

Galilee, and that Beroth was not far from Kadesh, which is upon the summit of the Galilean hills. According to the Scriptural account, the pursuit was to Sidon and Hazor on the W. of the mountains (see HAZOR), while the names of the confederates are those of places in lower Galilee and the maritime plain. It seems improbable that a force of chariots should be brought over to be hemmed in by the rugged mountains which border the narrow plain of Huleh on both sides, plains that are made still narrower by the swamps surrounding the lake (see JORDAN VALLEY) in Joshua's time, when they were much larger than they are now after having been filled with the accumulation of sediment brought down by mountain streams for 3,000 years. Conder, with much reason, supposes the "waters of Merom" to be the perennial stream Wādy el-Melek, near Shimrom-Merom (Semānieh), 5 miles W. of Nazareth. Were Lake Huleh referred to, the proper phrase would be Sea (yām) of Merom, rather than waters (mayim).

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

MERONOTHITE, mē-ron'ō-thīt, mē-rō'nō-thīt (מֵרֹנוֹתִי, mērōnōthī, √ meaning "fertility"): The designation of two persons in the OT:

(1) Jehdeiah, who was in charge of the royal asses under David (1 Ch 27 30).

(2) Jadon who was among the repairers of the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 7). No place of the name Meronoth can be identified. That Jadon worked on the wall near Gibeonites and Mizpahites affords no clear clue to the place, unless it be shown that there was some geographical rota in the wall repairers.

MEROZ, mē'roz (מֵרוֹז, mērōz; B, Μηρόζ, Mērōz, A, Μαζάρ, Mazār): This name occurs only once in Scripture. The angel of the Lord is represented as invoking curses upon Meroz because the inhabitants "came not to the help of Jeh" on the day of Deborah and Barak's victory (Jgs 5 23). It is a strange fate, shared with Chorazin, to be preserved from oblivion only by the record of a curse. The bitterness in the treatment of Meroz, not found in the references to any of the other delinquents, must be due to the special gravity of her offence. Reuben, Gilead and Dan were far away. This, however, is not true of Asher, who was also absent. Perhaps Meroz was near the field of battle and, at some stage of the conflict, within sight and hearing of the strife. If, when Zebulun "jeopardized their lives unto the death, and Naphtali, upon the high places of the field," they turned a deaf ear and a cold heart to the dire straits of their brethren, this might explain the fierce reproaches of Deborah.

Meroz may possibly be identified with el-Murussus, a mud-built village about 5 miles N.W. of Beisān, on the slopes to the N. of the Vale of Jezreel. If the Kedesh where Heber's tent was pitched be identical with Kadish to the W. of the Sea of Galilee, Sisera's flight, avoiding the Israelites in the neighborhood of Mt. Tabor, may have carried him past el-Murussus. If the inhabitants had it in their power to arrest him, but suffered him to escape (Moore, "Jgs," ICC, 163), such treachery to the nation's cause might well rouse the indignation of the heroic prophetess.

MERRAN, mer'an (Μερράν, Merrān; AV Meran): Many identifications have been suggested on the assumption that the text as it stands is correct. Some of these are the Sidonian Meareh (Grotius), Marane, a city of which Pliny speaks as being near the Red Sea (Keil), and the desert of Mahrah in Arabia (Fritzsche). It is very probable, however, that the name represents an error in transcription from the original Sem text, confusing the 7 with the 7, so that we should read Meddan, or Medan, i.e. Midian. The phrase will then run, "the merchants of Midian and Teman" (Bar 3 23). The merchants of Midian are referred to in Gen 37 28.

W. EWING

MERUTH, mē'ruth. See EMMERUTH.

MESALOTH, mes'a-loth (Μεσσαλόθ, Messalōth, Μαισαλόθ, Maisalōth): A place mentioned in the account of the march of Bacchides and Alcimus into Judah, as "in Arbela" (1 Macc 9 2). If Arbela be identical with Irbil or Irbid on the southern lip of Wādy el-Hamām, W. of the Sea of Galilee, this fixes the locality; but no name resembling Mesaloth has been found.

MESECH, mē'sek. See MESHECH.

MESHA, mē'sha:

(1) מִישָׁע, mēshā'; B, Μαρσά, Marisá, A, Μαρισάς, Marisás): Caleb's firstborn son, the father of Ziph, probably the ancestor of the Ziphites (1 Ch 2 42).

(2) מִישָׁע, mēshā'; B, Μισά, Misá, A, Μωσά, Mōsá): A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh, born in the land of Moab (1 Ch 8 9).

(3) מִישָׁע, mēshā'; Mōsá, Mōsá): A king of Moab. All the Bib. information regarding this monarch is contained in 2 K 3. Here we gather that Mesha was contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah and Jehoram. He was tributary to Israel, his annua contribution consisting of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. After the death of Ahab he asserted his independence. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the king of Edom joined forces with Jehoram in an attempt to quell the rebellion. At the instance of Elisha, who accompanied the host, water was miraculously provided when the army of the allies was ready to perish of thirst. Mesha came out against them and fell upon the camp. His attack was repulsed with heavy slaughter, and the defeated king was chased by the victors until he took refuge in the great fortress of Kir-hareseth. A vigorous siege was begun. Seeing that his case was desperate, Mesha attempted, with 700 men, to break through the lines. Failing in this, he offered his firstborn as a burnt offering upon the wall. Then "there came great wrath upon Israel" (by which, probably, panic is meant), and the besiegers retired, leaving their conquest incomplete.

In his inscription—see MOABITE STONE—Mesha gives an account of his rebellion, naming the places captured and fortified by him. It is not surprising that he says nothing of his defeat by Jehoram and his allies. There is, however, one serious discrepancy. The time Moab was under the supremacy of Israel, during the reign of Omri and half the reign of Ahab, he puts at 40 years. According to Bib. chronology, Omri and Ahab together reigned only 34 years. If, with Mesha, we deduct half the reign of Ahab, the period is reduced to 23 years. It is impossible to add to the length of either reign. So great a difference cannot be explained by the use of round numbers. Why Mesha should wish to increase the time of his people's subjection is not clear, unless, indeed, he thought in this way to magnify the glory of their deliverer.

In Mesha the sentiment of patriotism was wedded to some measure of military capacity. Judging by his inscription, he was also a deeply religious man according to his lights. Substitute "Jehovah" for "Chemosh," and his phraseology might be that of a pious Heb. king. The sacrifice of his son is at once the mark of the heathen and an index of the strength of his devotion.

(4) (מֶשָׁא, mēshā'; Maasāh, Massē): This appears to mark the western boundary of the land occupied by the descendants of Joktan (Gen 10 30). No certain identification is possible, but several more or less probable have been suggested: e.g. (a) The Gr. Mesene, on the Pers. Gulf, not far from the mouth of the Tigris and the Euphrates; (b) the Syro-Arabian desert, called Mashu in the Assyrian inscriptions; the name here, however, could hardly cover such a vast tract as this; more probably it denoted a place; (c) Dillmann would alter the vowels and identify it with Massā, a branch of the Ishmaelite stock (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30). This, however, furnishes no clue to the locality, the territory of that tribe being also unidentified. W. EWING

MESHACH, mē'shak (מֶשַׁח, mēshakh): Possibly the Sumerian form of the Bab. Šil-Asharidu, "the shadow of the prince," just as Shadrach probably means "the servant of Sin," and Abednego the "servant of Ishtar." Meshach was one of the three Heb. companions of Daniel, whose history is given in the first chapters of the Book of Dnl. See, further, under SHADRACH.

MESHECH, mē'shek, MESECH, mē'sek (מֶשֶׁךְ, meshekh, "long," "tall"; Μόσος, Mósoch): Son of Japheth (Gen 10 2; 1 Ch 1 5; ver 17 is a scribal error for "Mash"; cf Gen 10 22.23). His descendants and their dwelling-place (probably somewhere in the neighborhood of Armenia [Herod. iii.94]) seem to be regarded in Scripture as synonyms for the barbaric and remote (Ps 120 5; cf Isa 66 19, where Meshech should be read instead of "that draw the bow"). It is thought that the "Tibareni and Moschi" of the classical writers refer to the same people. Doubtless they appear in the annals of Assyria as enemies of that country under the names Tabali and Mushki—the latter the descendants of Meshech and the former those of Tubal to whom the term "Tibareni" may refer in the clause above. This juxtaposition of names is in harmony with practically every appearance of the word in Scripture. It is seldom named without some one of the others—Tubal, Javan, Gog and Magog. It is this which forms a good justification for making the suggested change in Isa 66 19, where Meshech would be in the usual company of Tubal and Javan. Ezekiel mentions them several times, first, as engaged in contributing to the trade of Tyre (Tiras of Gen 10 2?), in "vessels of brass" and—very significantly—slaves; again there is the association of Javan and Tubal with them (Ezk 27 13); second, they are included in his weird picture of the under-world: "them that go down into the pit" (32 18.26). They are mentioned again with Gog and Magog twice as those against whom the prophet is to "set his face" (Ezk 38 2.3; 39 1).

HENRY WALLACE

MESHELEMIAM, mē-shel-ē-mi'a (מֶשֶׁלֶמְיָא, m'shelemyāh, "Jeh repays"): Father of Zechariah, one of the porters of the tabernacle (1 Ch 9 21; 26 1.2 9). In the latter passage Mesheleemiah, with a final u, is credited with "sons and brethren, valiant men, 18." He is the "Sheleemiah" of ver 14, the "Shallum" of 1 Ch 9 17.19.31, and the "Mesullam" of Neh 12 25.

MESHEZABEL, mē-shez'a-bel (מֶשֶׁזְּבֵאל, m'shez-zēbh'ēl, "God a deliverer"; AV Meshezabeel, mē-shez'a-bēl):

(1) A priest, ancestor of Meshullam, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 4).

(2) One of the chiefs of the people giving name to the family which sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 21).

(3) A descendant of Judah through Zerach, and father of Pethahiah (Neh 11 24).

MESHILLEMITH, mē-shil'ē-mith (מֶשֶׁלֶמִית, m'shillēmīth, "retribution"): A priest, son of Immer, ancestor, according to 1 Ch 9 12, of Adaiah and Pashhur, and according to Neh 11 13, of Amashai. In the latter passage this name is spelled MESHILLEMOTH (q.v.).

MESHILLEMOTH, mē-shil'ē-moth, mē-shil'ē-mōth (מֶשֶׁלֶמֶת, m'shillēmōth, "recompense"):

(1) An Ephraimite ancestor of Berechiah, chief of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Ch 28 12).

(2) The "Meshillemith" of Neh 11 13.

MESHOBAB, mē-shō'bab (מֶשׁוֹבָב, m'shōbhābh): A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 34). This name heads the list of those who, for the sake of wider pasture-lands, occupied a Hamitic settlement in the neighborhood of Gerar (MT Gedor [q.v.]), and a Maonite settlement in Edomite territory (1 Ch 4 39-41). The latter event is dated in the days of Hezekiah (see Curtis, Chron., in loc.).

MESHULLAM, mē-shul'am (מֶשֻׁלָּם, m'shullām, "resigned" or "devoted"; cf Arab. Muslim; Μεσολλάμ, Mesollām): An OT name very common in post-exilic times.

(1) The grandfather of Shaphan (2 K 22 3).

(2) A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19).

(3) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 13).

(4) (5) (6) Three Benjamites (1 Ch 8 17; 9 7.8).

(7) The father of Hilkiah (1 Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11).

(8) A priest, son of Meshillemith (1 Ch 9 12); the parallel list (Neh 11 13) omits the name.

(9) A Kohathite appointed by Josiah as one of the overseers to direct the repairs of the temple (2 Ch 34 12).

(10) One of the chief men sent by Ezra to procure Levites to go up with him to Jerus (Ezr 8 16; cf 1 Esd 8 44).

(11) A Levite opposed to Ezra's regulations anent marriage with foreigners (Ezr 10 15; 1 Esd 9 14).

(12) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 29; cf 1 Esd 9 30).

(13) One of the repairers of the wall (Neh 3 4 30). His daughter was married to Jehohanan, the son of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6 18).

(14) One of the repairers of the Old Gate (Neh 3 6).

(15) A supporter of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4).

(16) One of those who subscribed the Covenant (Neh 10 20).

(17) A priest who subscribed the Covenant (Neh 10 7).

(18) (19) Two priests at the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12 13 16).

(20) A porter at the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12 25).

(21) A processionist at the dedication of the wall of Jerus (Neh 12 33). JOHN A. LEES

MESHULLEMETH, mē-shul'ē-meth (מְשֻׁלֶּמֶת, m'shullemeth): The wife of King Manasseh and mother of Amon (2 K 21 19). She is further designated "daughter of Haruz of Jotbah." This is the earliest instance of the birthplace being added to the designation of the queen mother. The name is properly the fem. of the frequently occurring MESHULLAM (q.v.).

MESOBATE, mē-sō'ba-it. See MEZOBAITE.

MESOPOTAMIA, mes-ō-pō-tā'mi-a. See SYRIA.

MESS, mes (מֶסֶת, mas'ēth): Any dish of food sent (Lat missum; Fr messe) to the table. It occurs in the OT in Gen 43 34 (bis); 2 S 11 8 EV, and in the NT in He 12 16, translating βρώσις, brōsis.

MESSENGER, mes'en-jēr: The regular Heb word for "messenger" is מַלְאָכִי, mal'ākhi, the Gr ἀγγελος, aggelos. This may be a human messenger or a messenger of God, an angel. The context must decide the right tr. In Hag 1 13 the prophet is called God's messenger; Job 33 23 changes AV to "angel" (m "messenger"); and Mal 3 1 m, suggests "angel" instead of "messenger." The Mal passages 2 7; 3 1 (bis) have caused a great deal of comment. See MALACHI. The Gr ἀπόστολος, apóstolos, "apostle," is rendered "messenger" in 2 Cor 8 23; Phil 2 25; 1 S 4 17 tr lit. from Heb בָּשָׂר, bāsar, "to tell good news," "he that brought the tidings." Gen 60 16 reads "message" instead of "messenger." A. L. BRESLICH

"Messias" (Jn 1 41; 4 25 AV) is a transcription of Messias, Messias, the Gr representation of the Aramaic. "Messiah" is thus a modification of the Gr form of the word, and Use of according to the Heb.

1. Meaning and Use of the Term The term is used in the OT of kings and priests, who were consecrated to office by the ceremony of anointing. It is applied to the priest only as an adj.—"the anointed priest" (Lev 4 3.5.16; 6 22 [Heb 15]). Its substantive use is restricted to the king; he only is called "the Lord's anointed," e.g. Saul (1 S 24 6.10 [Heb 7.11], etc); David (2 S 19 21 [Heb 22]; 23 1, "the anointed of the God of Jacob"); Zedekiah (Lam 4 20). Similarly in the Pss the king is designated "mine," "thine," "his anointed." Thus also even Cyrus (Isa 45 1), as being chosen and commissioned by Jeh to carry out His purpose with Israel. Some think the sing. "mine anointed" in Hab 3 13 denotes the whole people; but the Heb text is somewhat obscure, and the reference may be to the king. The pl. of the subst. is used of the patriarchs, who are called "mine anointed ones" (Ps 105 15; 1 Ch 16 22), as being Jeh's chosen, consecrated servants, whose persons were inviolable.

It is to be noted that "Messiah" as a special title is never applied in the OT to the unique king of the future, unless perhaps in Dnl 9 25 f (māshīah nāghīd, "Messiah-Prince"), a difficult passage, the interpretation of which is very uncertain. It was the later Jews of the post-prophetic period who, guided by a true instinct, first used the term in a technical sense.

The Messiah is the instrument by whom God's kingdom is to be established in Israel and in the world. The hope of a personal deliverer is thus inseparable from the wider hope that runs through the OT. The Jews were a nation who lived in the future. In this respect they stand alone among the peoples of antiquity. No nation ever cherished such strong expectations of a good time coming, or clung more tenaciously amid defeat and disaster to the certainty of final triumph over all enemies and of entrance upon a state of perfect peace and happiness. The basis of this larger hope is Jeh's covenant with Israel. "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God" (Ex 6 7). On the ground of this promise the prophets, while declaring God's wrath against His people on account of their sin, looked beyond the Divine chastisements to the final era of perfect salvation and blessedness, which would be ushered in when the nation had returned to Jeh.

The term "Messianic" is used in a double sense to describe the larger hope of a glorious future for the nation, as well as the narrower one of a personal Messiah who is to be the prominent figure in the perfected kingdom. It may be remarked that many writers, both prophetic and apocalyptic, who picture the final consummation, make no allusion whatever to a coming deliverer.

This art. will treat of the personal Messianic hope as it is found in the OT, in the pre-Christian age, and in the NT.

1. The Messiah in the OT.—The chief element in the conception of the Messiah in the OT is that of the king. Through him as head of the nation Jeh could most readily work out His saving purposes. But the kingdom of Israel was a theocracy.

1. The Messianic King In earlier times Moses, Joshua, and the judges, who were raised up by Jeh to guide His people at different crises in their history, did not claim to exercise authority apart from their Divine commission. Nor was the relation of Jeh to the nation as its real ruler in any way modified by the institution of the monarchy. It was by His Spirit that the king was qualified for the righteous government of the people, and by His power that he would become victorious over all enemies. The passage on which the idea of the Messianic king who would rule in righteousness and attain universal dominion was founded is Nathan's oracle to David in 2 S 7 11 ff. In contrast to Saul, from whom the kingdom had passed away, David would never want a descendant to sit on the throne of Israel. How strong an impression this promise of the perpetuity of his royal house had made on David is seen in his last words (2 S 23); and to this "everlasting covenant, and sure," the spiritual minds in Israel reverted in all after ages.

(1) Isaiah.—Isaiah is the first of the prophets to refer to an extraordinary king of the future. Amos (9 11) foretold the time when the shattered fortunes of Judah would be restored, while Hosea (3 5) looked forward to the reunion of the two kingdoms under David's line. But it is not till we reach the Assyrian age, when the personality of the king is brought into prominence against the great world-power, that we meet with any mention of a unique personal ruler who would bring special glory to David's house.

The kings of Syria and Israel having entered into a league to dethrone Ahaz and supplant him by an obscure adventurer, Isaiah (7 10-17) announces to the king of Judah that while, by the help of Assyria, he would survive the attack of the confederate kings, Jeh would, for his disobedience, bring devastation upon his own land through the instrumentality of his ally. But the prophet's lofty vision, though limited as in the case of other seers to the horizon of his own time, reaches beyond Judah's distress to Judah's deliverance. To the spiritual mind of Isaiah the revelation is made of a true king, Immanuel, "God-with-us," who would arise out of the house of David, now so unworthily represented by the profligate Ahaz. While the passage is one of the hardest to interpret in all the OT, perhaps too much has been made by some scholars of the difficulty connected with the word 'almah, "virgin." It is the mysterious personality of the child to which prominence is given in the prophecy. The significance of the name and the pledge of victory it implies, the reference to Immanuel as ruler of the land in 8 8 (if the present rendering be correct), as well as the parallelism of the line of thought in the prophecy with that of ch 9, would seem to point to the identity of Immanuel with the Prince of the four names, "Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace" (9 6 RVm). These Divine titles do not necessarily imply that in the mind of the prophet the Messianic king is God in the metaphysical sense—the essence of the Divine nature is not a dogmatic conception in the OT—but only that Jeh is present in Him in perfect wisdom and power, so that He exercises over His people forever a fatherly and peaceful rule. In confirmation of this interpretation reference may be made to the last of the great trilogy of Isaianic prophecies concerning the Messiah of the house of David (11 2), where the attributes with which He is endowed by the Spirit are those which qualify for the perfect discharge of royal functions in the kingdom of God. See IMMANUEL.

A similar description of the Messianic king is given by Isaiah's younger contemporary Micah (5 2 ff), who emphasizes the humble origin of the extraordinary ruler of the future, who shall spring from the Davidic house, while his reference to her who is to bear him confirms the interpretation which regards the virgin in Isaiah as the mother of the Messiah.

(2) Jeremiah and Ezekiel.—After the time of Isaiah and Micah the throne of David lost much of its power and influence, and the figure of the ideal king is never again portrayed with the same definiteness and color. Zephaniah, Nahum, and Habakkuk make no reference to him at all. By the great prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, however, the hope of a Davidic ruler is kept before the people. While there are passages in both of these writers which refer to a succession of pious rulers, this fact should not dominate our interpretation of other utterances of theirs which seem to point to a particular individual. By Jeremiah the Messiah is called the "righteous Branch" who is to be raised unto David and be called "Jehovah [is] our righteousness," that is, Jeh as the one making righteous dwells in him (Jer 23 5 f; cf 30 9). In Ezk he is alluded to as the coming one "whose right it is" (21 27), and as Jeh's "servant David" who shall be "prince" or "king" forever over a reunited people (34 23 f; 37 24). It is difficult to resist the impression which the language of Ezekiel makes that it is the ideal Messianic ruler who is here predicted, notwithstanding the fact that afterward, in the prophet's vision of the ideal theocracy, not only does the prince play a subordinate part, but provision is made in the constitution for a possible abuse of his authority.

(3) Later prophets.—After Ezekiel's time, during the remaining years of the exile, the hope of a pre-eminent king of David's house naturally disappears. But it is resuscitated at the restoration when Zerubbabel, a prince of the house of David and the civil head of the restored community, is made by Jeh of hosts His signet-ring, inseparable from Himself and the symbol of His authority (Hag 2 23). In the new theocracy, however, the figure of the Messianic ruler falls into the background before that of the high priest, who is regarded as the sign of the coming Branch (Zec 3 8). Still we have the unique prophecy of the author of Zec 9 9, who pictures the Messiah as coming not on a splendid charger like a warrior king, but upon the foal of an ass, righteous and victorious, yet lowly and peaceful, strong by the power of God to help and save. There is no mention of the Messianic king in Joel or Mal; but references in the later, as in the earlier, Pss to events in the lives of the kings or the history of the kingdom prove that the promise made to David was not forgotten, and point to one who would fulfil it in all its grandeur.

promise in Dt 18 15-20, as the context shows, refers to a succession of true prophets as opposed to the diviners of heathen nations. Though Moses passed away there would always be a prophet raised up by Jeh to reveal His will to the people, so that they would never need to have recourse to heathen soothsayers. Yet while the prophet is not an ideal figure, being already fully inspired by the Spirit, prophetic functions are to this extent associated with the kingship, that the Messiah is qualified by the Spirit for the discharge of the duties of His royal office and makes known the will of God by His righteous decisions (Isa 11 2-5).

It is more difficult to define the relationship of the priesthood to the kingship in the final era. They are brought into connection by Jeremiah (30 9, 21) who represents the new "David" as possessing the priestly right of immediate access to Jeh, while the Levitical priesthood, equally with the Davidic kingship, is assured of perpetuity on the ground of the covenant (Jer 33 18 ff). But after the restoration, when prominence is given to the high priest in the reconstitution of the kingdom, Joshua becomes the type of the coming "Branch" of the Davidic house (Zec 3 8), and, according to the usual interpretation, receives the crown—a symbol of the union of the kingly and priestly offices in the Messiah (Zec 6 11 ff). Many scholars, however, holding that the words "and the counsel of peace shall be between them both" can only refer to two persons, would substitute "Zerubbabel" for "Joshua" in ver 11, and read in ver 13, "there shall be a priest upon his right hand" (cf RV, LXX). The prophet's meaning would then be that the Messianic high priest would sit beside the Messianic king in the perfected kingdom, both working together as Zerubbabel and Joshua were then doing. There is no doubt, however, that the Messiah is both king and priest in Ps 110.

The bitter experiences of the nation during the exile originated a new conception, Messianic in the deepest sense, the Servant of Jeh

3. The Servant of Jehovah 43 8,10; 44 1,21; 49 3-6; 50 4-9; 52 13-53). As to whom the prophet refers in his splendid delineation of this mysterious being, scholars are hopelessly divided. The personification theory—that the Servant represents the ideal Israel, Israel as God meant it to be, as fulfilling its true vocation in the salvation of the world—is held by those who plead for a consistent use of the phrase throughout the prophecy. They regard it as inconceivable that the same title should be applied by the same prophet to two distinct subjects. Others admit that the chief difficulty in the way of this theory is to conceive it, but they maintain that it best explains the use of the title in the chief passages where it occurs. The other theory is that there is an expansion and contraction of the idea in the mind of the prophet. In some passages the title is used to denote the whole nation; in others it is limited to the pious kernel; and at last the conception culminates in an individual, the ideal yet real Israelite of the future, who shall fulfil the mission in which the nation failed.

What really divides expositors is the interpretation of 52 13-53. The question is not whether this passage was fulfilled in Jesus Christ—on this all Christian expositors are agreed—but whether the "Servant" is in the mind of the prophet merely the personification of the godly portion of the nation, or a person yet to come.

May not the unity argument be pressed too hard? If the Messiah came to be conceived of as a specific king while the original promise spoke of a dynasty, is it so inconceivable that the title "Servant of Jeh" should be used in an individual as well as in a collective sense? It is worthy of note, too, that not only in some parts of this prophecy, but all through it, the individuality of the sufferer is made prominent; the collective idea entirely disappears. The contrast is not between a faithful portion and the general body of the people, but between the "Servant" and every single member of the nation. Moreover, whatever objections may be urged against the individual interpretation, this view best explains the doctrine of substitution that runs through the whole passage. Israel was Jeh's elect people, His messenger of salvation to the Gentiles, and its faithful remnant suffered for the sins of the mass; even "Immanuel" shared in the sorrows of His people. But here the "Servant" makes atonement for the sins of individual Israelites; by his death they are justified and by his stripes they are healed. To this great spiritual conception only the prophet of the exile attains.

It may be added that in the Suffering Servant, who offers the sacrifice of himself as an expiation for the sins of the people, prophetic activity and kingly honor are associated with the priestly function. After he has been raised from the dead he becomes the great spiritual teacher of the world—by his knowledge of God and salvation which he communicates to others he makes many righteous (53 11; cf 42 1 ff; 49 2; 50 4); and as a reward for his sufferings he attains to a position of the highest royal splendor (52 15b; 53 12a; cf 49 7). See SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

In the Book of Dnl, written to encourage the Jewish people to steadfastness during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Messianic hope of the prophets assumes a new form. Here the apocalyptic idea of the Messiah appears for the first time in Jewish literature. The coming into the ruler is represented, not as a descendant of the house of David, but as a person in human form and of super-human character, through whom God is to establish His sovereignty upon the earth. In the prophet's vision (Dnl 7 13 f) one "like unto a son of man," k'bar 'ēnāsh (not, as in AV, "like the son of man"), comes with the clouds of heaven, and is brought before the ancient of days, and receives an imperishable kingdom, that all peoples should serve him.

Scholars are by no means agreed in their interpretation of the prophecy. In support of the view that the "one like unto a son of man" is a symbol for the ideal Israel, appeal is made to the interpretation given of the vision in vs 18 22,27, according to which dominion is given to "the saints of the Most High." Further, as the four heathen kingdoms are represented by the brute creation, it would be natural for the higher power, which is to take their place, to be symbolized by the human form.

But strong reasons may be urged, on the other hand, for the personal Messianic interpretation of the passage. A distinction seems to be made between "one like unto a son of man" and the saints of the Most High in ver 21, the saints being there represented as the object of persecution from the little horn. The scene of the judgment is earth, where the saints already are, and to which the ancient of days and the "one like unto a son of man" descend (vs 22,13). And it is in accordance with the interpretation given of the vision in ver 17, where reference is made to the four kings of the bestial kingdoms, that the kingdom of the saints, which is to be established in their place, should also be represented by a royal head.

It may be noted that a new idea is suggested by this passage, the preexistence of the Messiah before His manifestation.

II. The Messiah in the Pre-Christian Age.—After prophetic inspiration ceased, there was little

1. Post-prophetic Age in the teaching of the scribes, or in the reconstitution of the kingdom under the rule of the high priests, to quicken the ancient hope of the nation. It would appear from the Apoc that while the elements of the general expectation were still cherished, the specific hope of a preminent king of David's line had grown very dim in the consciousness of the people. In Ecclesiastes (47 11) mention is made of a "covenant of kings and a throne of glory in Israel which the Lord gave unto David"; yet even this allusion to the everlasting duration of the Davidic dynasty is more of the nature of a historical statement than the expression of a confident hope.

In the earlier stages of the Maccabean uprising, when the struggle was for religious freedom, the people looked for help to God alone, and would probably have been content to acknowledge the political supremacy of Syria after liberty had been granted them in 162 BC to worship God according to their own law and ceremonial. But the successful effort of the Maccabean leaders in achieving political independence, while it satisfied the aspirations of the people generally "until there should arise a faithful prophet" (1 Macc 14 41; cf 2 57), brought religious and national ideals into conflict. The "Pious" (hāšīdīm), under the new name of Pharisees, now became more than ever devoted to the Law, and repudiated the claim of a Maccabean to be high priest and his subsequent assumption of the royal title, while the Maccabees with their political ambitions took the side of the aristocracy and alienated the people. The national spirit, however, had been stirred into fresh life. Nor did the hope thus quickened lose any of its vitality when, amid the strife of factions and the quarrels of the ruling family, Pompey captured Jerus in 63 BC. The fall of the Hasmonean house, even more than its ascendancy, led the nation to set its hope more firmly on God and to look for a deliverer from the house of David.

The national sentiment evoked by the Maccabees finds expression in the Apocalyptic lit. of the century and a half before Christ.

3. Apocalyptic Literature

In the oldest parts of the Sib Or (3 652-56) there occurs a brief prediction of a king whom God shall send from the sun, who shall "cause the whole earth to cease from wicked war, killing some and exacting faithful oaths from others. And this he will do, not according to his own counsel, but in obedience to the beneficent decrees of God." And in a later part of the same book (3 49) there is an allusion to "a pure king who will wield the sceptre over the whole earth for ever." It may be the Messiah also who is represented in the earlier part of the Book of En (90 37 f) as a glorified man under the symbol of a white bull with great horns, which is feared and worshipped by all the other animals (the rest of the religious community) and into whose likeness they are transformed.

But it is in the Ps Sol, which were composed in the Pompeian period and reveal their Pharisaic origin by representing the Hasmonians as a race of usurpers, that we have depicted in clear outline and glowing colors the portrait of the Davidic king (Ps Sol 17 18). The author looks for a personal Messiah who, as son of David and king of Israel, will purge Jerus of sinners, and gather together a holy people who will all be the "sons of their God." He shall not conquer with earthly weapons, for the Lord Himself is his King; he shall smite the earth with the breath of his mouth; and the heathen of their own accord shall come to see his glory, bringing the wearied children of Israel as gifts. His throne shall be established in wisdom and justice, while he himself shall be pure from sin and made strong in the Holy Spirit.

It is evident that in these descriptions of the coming one we have something more than a mere revival of the ancient hope of a preëminent king of David's house. The repeated disasters that overtook the Jews led to the transference of the national hope to a future world, and consequently to the transformation of the Messiah from a mere earthly king into a being with supernatural attributes. That this supernatural apocalyptic hope, which was at least coming to be cherished, exercised an influence on the national hope is seen in the Ps Sol, where emphasis is laid on the striking individuality of this Davidic king, the moral grandeur of his person, and the Divine character of his rule.

We meet with the apocalyptic conception of the Messiah in the Similitudes of Enoch (chs 37-71) and the later apocalypses. Reference may be made at this point to the Similitudes on account of their unique expression of Messianic doctrine, although their pre-Christian date, which Charles puts not later than 64 BC, is much disputed. The Messiah who is called "the Anointed," "the Elect one," "the Righteous one," is represented, though in some sense man, as belonging to the heavenly world. His preëxistence is affirmed. He is the supernatural Son of Man, who will come forth from His concealment to sit as Judge of all on the throne of His glory, and dwell on a transformed earth with the righteous forever. For further details in the conceptions of this period, see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE (JEWISH); ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT.

III. The Messiah in the NT.—To the prevalence of the Messianic hope among the Jews in the time of Christ the Gospel records bear ample testimony. We see from the question of the Baptist that "the coming one" was expected (Mt 11 3 and ||), while the people wondered whether John himself were the Christ (Lk 3 15).

(1) The Messiah as king.—In the popular conception the Messiah was chiefly the royal son of David who would bring victory and prosperity to the Jewish nation and set up His throne in Jerus. In this Conception capacity the multitude hailed Jesus on His entry into the capital (Mt 21 9 and ||); to the Pharisees also the Messiah was the son of David (Mt 22 42). It would seem that apocalyptic elements mingled with the national expectation, for it was supposed that the Messiah would come forth suddenly from concealment and attest Himself by miracles (Jn 7 27, 31).

But there were spiritual minds who interpreted the nation's hope, not in any conventional sense, but according to their own devout aspirations. Looking for "the consolation of Israel," "the redemption of Jerus," they seized upon the spiritual features of the Messianic king and recognized in Jesus the promised Saviour who would deliver the nation from its sin (Lk 2 25 30, 38; cf 1 68-79).

(2) His prophetic character.—From the statements in the Gospels regarding the expectation of a prophet it is difficult to determine whether the prophetic function was regarded as belonging to the Messiah. We learn not only that one of the old prophets was expected to reappear (Mt 14 2; 16 14 and ||), but also that a preëminent prophet was looked for, distinct from the Messiah (Jn 1 21, 25; 7 40 f). But the two conceptions of prophet and king seem to be identified in Jn 6 14 f, where we are told that the multitude, after recognizing in Jesus the expected prophet, wished to take Him by force and make Him a king. It would appear that while the masses were looking forward to a temporal king, the expectations of some were molded by the image and promise of Moses. And to the woman of Samaria, as to her people, the Messiah was simply a prophet, who would bring the full light of Divine knowledge into the world (Jn 4 25). On the other hand, from Philip's description of Jesus we would naturally infer that he saw in Him whom he had found the union of a prophet like unto Moses and the Messianic king of the prophetic books (Jn 1 45).

(3) The title "Son of God."—It cannot be doubted that the "Son of God" was used as a Messianic title by the Jews in the time of Our Lord. The high priest in presence of the Sanhedrin recognized it as such (Mt 26 63). It was applied also in its official sense to Jesus by His disciples: John the Baptist (Jn 1 34), Nathanael (1 49), Mary (11 27), Peter (Mt 16 16, though not in ||). This Messianic use was based on Ps 2 7; cf 2 S 7 14. The title as given to Jesus by Peter in his confession, "the Son of the living God," is suggestive of something higher than a mere official dignity, although its full significance in the unique sense in which Jesus claimed it could scarcely have been apprehended by the disciples till after His resurrection.

(1) His claim.—The claim of Jesus to be the Messiah is written on the face of the evangelic history. But while He accepted the title, He stripped it of its political and national significance and filled it with an ethical and universal content. The Jewish expectation of a great king who would restore the throne of David and free the nation from a foreign yoke was interpreted by Jesus as of one who would deliver God's people from spiritual foes and found a universal kingdom of love and peace.

(2) His delay in making it.—To prepare the Jewish mind for His transformation of the national hope Jesus delayed putting forth His claim before the multitude till His triumphal entry into Jerus, which, be it noted, He made in such a way as to justify His interpretation of the Messiah of the prophets, while He delayed emphasizing it to His disciples till the memorable scene at Caesarea Philippi when He drew forth Peter's confession.

(3) "The Son of Man."—But he sought chiefly to secure the acceptance of Himself in all His lowliness as the true Messianic king by His later use of His self-designation as the "Son of Man." While "Son of Man" in Aram., bar nāshā, may mean simply "man," an examination of the chief passages in which the title occurs shows that Jesus applied it to Himself in a unique sense. That He had the passage in Dnl in His mind is evident from the phrases He employs in describing His future coming (Mk 8 38; 13 26 and ¶; 14 62 and ¶). By this apocalyptic use of the title He put forward much more clearly His claim to be the Messiah of national expectation who would come in heavenly glory. But He used the title also to announce the tragic destiny that awaited Him (Mk 8 31). This He could do without any contradiction, as He regarded His death as the beginning of His Messianic reign. And those passages in which He refers to the Son of Man giving His life a ransom "for many" (Mt 20 28 and ¶) and going "as it is written of him" (Mt 26 24 and ¶), as well as Lk 22 37, indicate that He interpreted Isa 53 of Himself in His Messianic character. By His death He would complete His Messianic work and inaugurate the kingdom of God. Thus by the help of the title "Son of Man" Jesus sought, toward the close of His ministry, to explain the seeming contradiction between His earthly life and the glory of His Messianic kingship.

It may be added that Our Lord's use of the phrase implies what the Gospels suggest (Jn 12 34), that the "Son of Man," notwithstanding the references in Dnl and the Similitudes of Enoch (if the pre-Christian date be accepted), was not regarded by the Jews generally as a Messianic title. For He could not then have applied it, as He does, to Himself before Peter's confession, while maintaining His reserve in regard to His claims to be the Messiah. Many scholars, however, hold that the "Son of Man" was already a Messianic title before Our Lord employed it in His conversation with the disciples at Caesarea Philippi, and regard the earlier passages in which it occurs as inserted out of chronological order, or the presence of the title in them either as a late insertion, or as due to the ambiguity of the Aramaic. See SON OF MAN.

The thought of a suffering Messiah who would atone for sin was alien to the Jewish mind. This is evident from the conduct, not only of the opponents, but of the followers of Jesus (Mt 16 22; 17 23). While His disciples believed Him to be the Messiah, they could not understand His allusions to His sufferings, and regarded His death as the extinction of all their hopes (Lk 18 34; 24 21). But after His resurrection and ascension they were led, by the impression His personality and teaching had made upon them, to see how entirely they had misconceived His Messiahship and the nature and extent of His Messianic kingdom (Lk 24 31; Acts 2 36, 38 f.). They were confirmed, too, in their spiritual conceptions when they searched into the ancient prophecies in the light of the cross. In the mysterious form of the Suffering Servant they beheld the Messianic king on His way to His heavenly throne, conquering by the power of His atoning sacrifice and bestowing all spiritual blessings (Acts 3 13, 18–21, 26; 4 27, 30; 8 35; 10 36–43).

(1) Future manifestation.—New features were now added to the Messiah in accordance with Jesus' own teaching. He had ascended to

4. New Elements Added His Father and become the heavenly king. But all things were not yet put under Him. It was therefore seen that the full manifestation of His Messiahship was reserved for the future, that He would return in glory to fulfil His Messianic office and complete His Messianic reign.

(2) Divine personality.—Higher views of His personality were now entertained. He is declared to be the Son of God, not in any official, but in a unique sense, as coequal with the Father (Jn 1 1; Rom 1 4, 7; 1 Cor 1 3, etc.). His preexistence is affirmed (Jn 1 1; 2 Cor 8 9); and when He comes again in His Messianic glory, He will exercise the Divine function of Universal Judge (Acts 10 42; 17 30 f, etc.).

(3) Heavenly priesthood.—The Christian conception of the Messianic king who had entered into His glory through suffering and death carried with it the doctrine of the Messianic priesthood. But it took some time for early Christian thought to advance from the new discovery of the combination of humiliation and glory in the Messiah to concentrate upon His heavenly life. While the preaching of the first Christians was directed to show from the Scriptures that "Jesus is the Christ" and necessarily involved the ascription to Him of many functions characteristic of the true priest, it was reserved for the author of the Ep. to the He to set forth this aspect of His work with separate distinctness and to apply to Him the title of our "great high priest" (He 4 14). As the high priest on the Day of Atonement not only sprinkled the blood upon the altar, but offered the sacrifice, so it was now seen that by passing into the heavens and presenting to God the offering He had made of Himself on earth, Jesus had fulfilled the high-priestly office.

Thus the ideal of the Heb prophets and poets is amply fulfilled in the person, teaching and work of Jesus of Nazareth. Apologists may often err in supporting the argument from prophecy by an extravagant symbolism and a false exegesis; but they are right in the contention that the essential elements in the OT conception—the Messianic king who stands in a unique relation to Jeh as His "Son," and who will exercise universal dominion; the supreme prophet who will never be superseded; the priest forever—are gathered up and transformed by Jesus in a way the ancient seers never dreamed of. As the last and greatest prophet, the suffering Son of Man, and the sinless Saviour of the world, He meets humanity's deepest longings for Divine knowledge, human sympathy, and spiritual deliverance; and as the unique Son of God, who came to reveal the Father, He rules over the hearts of men by the might of eternal love. No wonder that the NT writers, like Jesus Himself, saw references to the Messiah in OT passages which would not be conceded by a historical interpretation. While recognizing the place of the old covenant in the history of salvation, they sought to discover in the light of the fulfilment in Jesus the meaning of the OT which the Spirit of God intended to convey, the Divine, saving thoughts which constitute its essence. And to us, as to the early Christians, "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev 19 10). To Him, hidden in the bosom of the ages, all the scattered rays of prophecy pointed; and from Him, in His revealed and risen splendor, shine forth upon the world the light and power of God's love and truth. And through the history and experience of His people He is bringing to larger realization the glory and passion of Israel's Messianic hope.

METAL, met'al (מַטְאָל, hashmal; ἤλεκτρον, ēlektron; AV amber; Ezk 8 2, RVm "amber"): The substance here intended is a matter of great uncertainty. In Egypt bronze was called hesmen, which may be connected with the Heb hashmal; the Gr ēlektron too has generally been accepted as an alloy of gold or silver or other metals, but this is far from certain. Professor Ridgeway (EB, I, cols. 134-36) has conclusively shown, however, that amber was well known in early times and that there is nothing archaeologically improbable in the reading of AV.

Amber is a substance analogous to the vegetable resins, and is in all probability derived from extinct coniferous trees. The best or yellow variety was obtained by the ancients from the coasts of the Baltic where it is still found more plentifully than elsewhere. A red amber has been found in South Europe and in Phoenicia. From earliest times amber has been prized as an ornament; Homer apparently refers to it twice. Amber bracelets and necklaces are highly prized by the Orientals—esp. Jewesses—today, and they are credited with medicinal properties. See ELECTRUM; STONES, PRECIOUS.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

METALLURGY, met'al-ūr-ji: There are numerous Bib. references which describe or allude to the various metallurgical operations. In Job 28 1 occurs צָרָה, zārah, tr<sup>d</sup> "refine," lit. "strain." This undoubtedly refers to the process of separating the gold from the earthy material as pictured in the Egypt sculptures (Thebes and Beni Hassan) and described by Diodorus. The ore was first crushed to the size of lentils and then ground to powder in a handmill made of granite slabs. This powder was spread upon a slightly inclined stone table and water was poured over it to wash away the earthy materials. The comparatively heavy gold particles were then gathered from the table, dried, and melted in a closed crucible with lead, salt and bran, and kept in a molten condition for 5 days, at the end of which time the gold came out pure.

The alloying of gold and silver with copper, lead or tin, and then removing the base metals by cupellation is used figuratively in Ezk 22 18, 22 to denote the coming judgment of Jeh. Again in Isa 1 25 it indicates chastening. The fact that the prophets used this figure shows that the people were familiar with the common metallurgical operations. See REFINER.

JAMES A. PATCH

METALS, met'alz (Lat metallum, "metal," "mine"; Gr μέταλλον, metallon, "mine"): The metals known by the ancients were copper, gold, iron, lead, silver and tin. Of these copper, gold and silver were probably first used, because, occurring in a metallic state, they could be separated easily from earthy materials by mechanical processes. Evidence is abundant of the use of these three metals by the people of remotest antiquity. Lead and tin were later separated from their ores. Tin was probably used in making bronze before it was known as a separate metal, because the native oxide, cassiterite, was smelted together with the copper ore to get bronze. Because of the difficulties in getting it separated from its compounds, iron was the last in the list to be employed. In regard to the sources of these metals in Bible times we have few Bib. references to guide us. Some writers point to Dt 8 9, "a land whose stones are iron," etc, as referring to Pal. Pal can be disregarded, however, as a source of metals, for it possesses no mineral deposits of any importance. If it was expected that Israel would possess Lebanon also, then the description would be more true. There is some iron ore which was anciently worked, although present-day engineers have declared it not to be extensive enough to pay for working. There is a little copper ore (chalcopyrite, malachite, azurite). In the Anti-Lebanon and Northern Syria, esp. in the country E. of Aleppo now opened up by the Bagdad Railroad and its branches, there are abundant deposits of copper. This must have been the land of Nuhašše referred to in the Am Tab. If Zec 6 1 is really a reference to copper, which is doubtful, then the last-mentioned source was probably the one referred to. No doubt Cyprus (Alasia in Am Tab [?]) furnished the ancients with much copper, as did also the Sinaitic peninsula.

Tarshish is mentioned (Ezk 27 12) as a source of silver, iron, tin, and lead. This name may belong to Southern Spain. If so it corresponds to the general belief that the Phoenicians brought a considerable proportion of the metals used in Pal from that country. Havilah (Gen 2 11), Ophir (1 K 10 11), Sheba (Ps 72 15) are mentioned as sources of gold. These names probably refer to districts of Arabia. Whether Arabia produced all the gold or simply passed it on from more remote sources is a question (see GOLD).

From the monuments in Egypt we learn that that country was a producer of gold and silver. In fact, the ancient mines and the ruins of the miners' huts are still to be seen in the desert regions of upper Egypt. In the Sinaitic peninsula are deposits of copper, lead, gold, and silver. The most remarkable of the ancient Egypt mines are situated here (J. Sarabit el Khadīm, U. Sidreh, W. Magharah). The early Egypt kings (Sneferu, Amenemhat II, and others) not only mined the metals, but cut on the walls of the mines inscriptions describing their methods of mining. Here, as in upper Egypt, are remains of the buildings where miners lived or carried out their metallurgical operations. It is hardly to be conceived that the large deposits of lead (galena) in Asia Minor were unworked by the ancients. No nearer deposits of tin than those in Southeastern Europe have yet been found. (For further information on metals see separate articles.)

METAL WORKING. See CRAFTS, 10; MINING.

METE, mēt (מִטָּה, mādhadh): "To measure," either with a utensil of dry measure, as in Ex 16 18, or to measure with a line or measure of length, as in Ps 60 6; 108 7; Isa 40 12. In Isa 18 2.7 it is the rendering of kaw, kaw, lit. "line-line," i.e. measuring line, referring to the Ethiopians as a nation that measured off other peoples for destruction and trod them down, as in RV. It is regarded by some as signifying strength, being cognate with the Arab. قَوِي, kawī, "strong." For mete of Mt 7 2 and || passages in Mk 4 24; Lk 6 38, see MEASURE.

METERUS, mē-tē'rus. See BAITERUS.

METEYARD, mēt'yārd (מֵטֵיָרֵד, middāh, "a measure," Lev 19 35): Has this meaning in AV and RV, but in ARV, "measures of length."

METHEG-AMMAH, mē-theg-am'a, meth-eg-am'a (מֵתֵג אֲמָה, methegh hā-ammāh, "bridle of the metropolis"; LXX ἡν ἀφορσμένην, tēn aphorismēnēn): It is probable that the place-name M. in 2 S 8 1 AV should be rendered as in RV, "the bridle of the mother city," i.e. Gath, since we find in the || passage in 1 Ch 18 1 גַּת וּבְתוֹתֶיהָ, gath ūbh'nōlthēhā, "Gath and her daughters," i.e. daughter towns. The LXX has an entirely different reading: "and David took the tribute out of the hand of the Philis," showing that they had a different text from what we now have in the Heb. The text is evidently corrupt. If a place is intended its site is unknown, but it must have been in the Philistean plain and in the vicinity of Gath. H. PORTER

METHUSAEEL, mē-thū'sā-el. See METHUSAEEL.

METHUSELAH, mē-thū'sē-la, me-thū'se-la (מֵתוּשֶׁלַח, m'thūshelāh, "man of the javelin"): A descendant of Seth, the son of Enoch, and father of Lamech (Gen 5 21 ff; 1 Ch 1 3; Lk 3 37). Methuselah is said to have lived 969 years; he is therefore the oldest of the patriarchs and the oldest man. It is doubtful whether these long years do not include the duration of a family or clan.

METHUSHAEL, mē-thū'shā-el (מֵתוּשָׁאֵל, m'thūshā'ēl): A descendant of Cain, and father of Lamech in the Cainite genealogy (Gen 4 18). The meaning of the name is doubtful. Dillmann suggested "suppliant or man of God."

MEUNIM, mē-ū'nim (AV Mehunim). See MAON.

MEUZAL, mē-ū'zal (מֵעֻזָּל, m'ēūzāl, or מֵעֻזָּל, m'ēūzāl): A word which occurs only in AVm of Ezk 27 19. The rendering in AV text is "going to and fro," in RV text "with yarn," but in RVm, in agreement with BDB and most modern authorities, Meuzal is regarded as a proper noun with a prefixed preposition, and is rendered "from Uzal." See UZAL.

ME-ZAHAB, mez'a-hab, me-zā'hab (מֵי זָהָב, mē zāhāb, "waters of gold"; B, Μαῖζαῖος, Maizōōs, A, Μεζοῖος, Mezōōs): Grandfather of Mehetabel, the wife of Hadar, the last-mentioned "duke" of Edom descended from Esau (Gen 36 39). The Jewish commentators made much play with this name. Abarbanel, e.g., says he was "rich and great, so that on this account he was called Mezahab, for the gold was in his house as water." The name, however, may denote a place, in which case it may be identical with Dizahab.

MEZARIM, mez'a-rim (NORTH). See ASTRONOMY, II, 13, (1).

MEZOBATE, mē-zō'ba-it (הַמֵּצֹבָה, ha-me-ṣōbhāyāh): The designation of Jaasiel, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 47).

MIAMIN, mī'a-min. See MIJAMIN; MINIAMIN.

MIBHAR, mib'hār (מִבְּחָר, mibhār, "choice" [?]): According to 1 Ch 11 38, the name of one of David's heroes. No such name, however, occurs in the || passage (2 S 23 36). A comparison of the two records makes it probable that mibhār is a corruption of miṣṣōbhāh="from Zobah," which completes the designation of the former name, Nathan of Zobah. The concluding words of the verse, Ben-Hagri="the son of Hagri," will then appear as a misreading of Bānī ha-gādhī="Bani, the Gadite," thus bringing the two records into accord.

MIBSAM, mib'sam (מִבְּשָׁם, mibhsām, "perfume" [?]):

- (1) A son of Ishmael (Gen 25 13; 1 Ch 1 29).
- (2) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 25).

MIBZAR, mib'zār (מִבְּצָר, mibhṣār, "a fortress"): An Edomite chief, AV "duke" (Gen 36 42; 1 Ch 1 53). According to Eusebius, Mibzar is connected with Mibsara, a considerable village subject to Petra and still existing in his time. Cf Holzinger and Skinner in respective comms. on Gen.

MICA, mī'ka (מִיכָה, mikhā): A variant of the name Micah, and probably like it a contracted form of MICAH (q.v.). In AV it is sometimes spelled "Micha."

- (1) A son of Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (2 S 9 12, AV "Micha"). In 1 Ch 8 34, he is called "Micah."

- (2) The son of Zichri (1 Ch 9 15). In Neh 11 17 (AV "Micha"), he is designated "the son of Zabdī," and in Neh 12 35, his name appears as "Micaiah [AV "Michaiah"], the son of Zaccur."

- (3) One of the signatories of the Covenant (Neh 10 11, AV "Micha"). JOHN A. LEES

MICAH, mī'ka (מִיכָה, mikhāh, contracted from מִיכָהיָהוּ, mikhāyāhū, "who is like Jeh?"; B, Μαῖχαῖος, Meichaios, A, Μιχαῖ, Michá; sometimes in AV spelled Michah):

- (1) The chief character of an episode given as an appendix to the Book of Jgs (Jgs 17, 18). Micah, a dweller in Mt. Ephraim, was the founder and owner of a small private sanctuary with accessories for worship (17 1-5), for which he hired as priest a Judaeen Levite (17 7-13). Five men sent in quest of new territory by the Danites, who had failed to secure a settlement upon their own tribal allotment, visited Micah's shrine, and obtained from his priest an oracle favoring their quest (18 1-6). They then went on until they reached the town of Laish in the extreme N., and deeming it suitable for their purpose, they returned to report to their fellow-tribesmen. These at once dispatched thither 600 armed men, accompanied by their families (18 7-12). Passing Micah's abode, they appropriated his idols and his priest, and when their owner pursued, he was insulted and threatened (18 13-26). They took Laish, destroyed it with its inhabitants and rebuilt it under the name of Dan. There they established the stolen images, and appointed Micah's Levite, Jonathán, a grandson of Moses (AV "Manasseh"), priest of the new sanctuary, which was long famous in Israel (18 27-31).

The purpose of the narrative is evidently to set forth the origin of the Danite shrine and priesthood. A few peculiarities in the story have led some critics—e.g., Moore, "Judges," in ICC and "Judges" in SBOT; Budde, Richer—to regard it as composite. Wellhausen, however, considers that the peculiarities are editorial and have been introduced for the purpose of smoothing or explaining the ancient record. Most authorities are agreed that the story is nearly contemporary with the events which it narrates, and that it is of the highest value for the study of the history of Israelitish worship. See also JUDGES; DAN; PRIESTHOOD.

(2) A Reubenite, whose descendant Beerah was carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5 5).

(3) A son of Merib-baal (1 Ch 8 34 f; 9 40 f). See MICAH, (1).

(4) A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 23 20; 24 24 f).

(5) The father of Abdon, one of Josiah's messengers to the prophetess Huldah (2 Ch 34 20). In the || passage (2 K 22 12), the reading is "Achbor the son of Micaiah," AV "Michaiah."

(6) A Simeonite mentioned in the Book of Jth (Jth 6 15).

(7) The prophet, called, in Jer 26 18 (Heb), "Micaiah the Morashtite." See special article.

(8) The son of Imlah. See MICAH, (7).

JOHN A. LEES

MICAH (מִיכָה, mikhāh; Μεχάας, Meichāas; an abbreviation for Micaiah [Jer 26 18], and this again of the longer form of the word

1. Name and Person in 2 Ch 17 7; cf 1 K 22 8): The name signifies "who is like Jeh?"; cf Michael, equal to "who is like El?"

(i.e. God). As this name occurs not infrequently, he is called the "Morashtite," i.e. born in More-sheth. He calls his native city, in 1 14, More-sheth-gath, because it was situated near the Phili city of Gath. According to Jerome and Eusebius, this place was situated not far eastward from Eleutheropolis. The prophet is not to be confounded with Micah ben Imia, in 1 K 22 8, an older prophet of the Northern Kingdom.

According to Jer 26 18, Micah lived and prophesied in the reign of Hezekiah; according to Mic 1 1, he labored also under Jotham and

2. Time of Micah Ahaz. This superscription has, it must be said, great similarity to Isa 1 1 and is probably of a later date.

Yet the contents of his first discourse confirm the fact that he prophesied, not only before the destruction of Samaria, but also before the reformation of Hezekiah (cf Mic 1 5). Accordingly, ch 1 is probably a discourse spoken already under Ahaz, and chs 2 to 5 under Hezekiah. No mention is any longer made of Samaria in chs 2 to 5. This city has already been destroyed; at any rate, is being besieged. Accordingly, these discourses were pronounced after the year 722 BC, but earlier than 701 BC, as the reformation of Hezekiah had not yet been entirely completed. It is impossible to date exactly these discourses, for this reason, that all the separate sentences and addresses were afterward united into one well-edited collection, probably by Micah himself. The attacks that have been made by different critics on the authenticity of chs 4 and 5 have but a poor foundation. It is a more difficult task to explain the dismal picture of the conditions of affairs as described in chs 6 and 7 as originating in the reign of Hezekiah. For this reason, scholars have thought of ascribing them to the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz. But better reasons speak for placing them in the degenerate reign of Manassah. There is no reason for claiming that Micah no longer prophesied in the times of this king. It is true that a number of critics declare that Micah did not write these chapters, esp. the so-called psalm in 7 7-20, which, it is claimed, clearly presupposes the destruction of Jerus (7 11)! But it is a fact that Micah did really and distinctly predict this destruction and the exile that followed this event in 3 12; and accordingly he could in this concluding hymn very easily have looked even beyond this period.

Micah is, then, a younger contemporary of Isaiah, and, like the latter, he prophesied in Judah, perhaps also in Jerus. To the writings of this great prophet his book bears a close resemblance both in form and in contents, although he did not, as was the case with Isaiah, come into personal contact with the kings and make his influence

3. Relation to Isaiah felt in political affairs. The statement in Mic 4 1 ff is found almost literally in Isa 2 2 ff. Opinions differ as to who is to be credited with the original, Isaiah or Micah. In the latter, the passage seems to suit better into the connection, while in Isa 2 it begins the discourse abruptly, as though the prophet had taken it from some other source. However, Mic 4 4 f is certainly a sentence added by Micah, who, accordingly, was not the first to formulate the prophecy itself. It is possible that both prophets took it from some older prophet. But it is also conceivable that Isaiah is the author. In this case, he placed this sentence at the head of his briefer utterances when he composed his larger group of addresses in chs 2-4, for the purpose of expressing the high purposes which God has in mind in His judgments.

Micah combats in his discourses, as does Isaiah, the heathenish abuses which had found their way into the cult, not only in Samaria, but

4. Contents of the Prophecies also in Judah and Jerus, and which the reformation of Hezekiah could counteract only in part and not at all permanently (cf 1 5-7; 5 11-13; 6 7.16). Further, he rebukes them for the social injustice, of which particularly the powerful and the great in the land were guilty (2 1 ff; 3 2 f.10 f); and the dishonesty and unfaithfulness in business and in conduct in general (cf 6 10 ff; 7 2 ff). At all times Micah, in doing this, was compelled to defend himself against false prophets, who slighted these charges as of little importance, and threatened and antagonized the prophet in his announcements of impending evil (cf 2 5 ff.11 ff). In pronounced opposition to these babblers and their predictions of good things, Micah announces the judgment through the enemies that are approaching, and he even goes beyond Isaiah in the open declaration that Jerus and the temple are to be destroyed (3 12; 4 10; 5 1). The first-mentioned passage is also confirmed by the event reported in Jer 26 17 ff. The passage 4 10, where in a surprising way Babylon is mentioned as the place of the exile, is for this reason regarded as unauthentic by the critics, but not justly. Micah predicts also the deliverance from Babylon and the reestablishment of Israel in Jerus, and declares that this is to take place through a King who shall come forth from the deepest humiliation of the house of David and shall be born in Bethlehem, and who, like David, originally a simple shepherd boy, shall later become the shepherd of the people, and shall make his people happy in peace and prosperity. Against this King the last great onslaught of the Gentiles will avail nothing (4 11-13; 5 4 ff). As a matter of course, he will purify the country of all heathen abuses (5 9 ff). In the description of this ruler, Micah again agrees with Isaiah, but without taking the details from that prophet.

The form of the prophecies of Micah, notwithstanding their close connection with those of his

5. Form of the Prophecies great contemporary, has nevertheless its unique features. There is a pronounced formal similarity between Mic 1 10 ff and Isa 10 28 ff. Still more than is the case in Isaiah, Micah makes use of the names of certain places. Witty references, which we can understand only in part, are not lacking in this connection; e.g. Lachish, the "city of horses," is made the object of a play on words. (Recently in the ruins of this city a large wall has been unearthed.) The style of Micah is vigorous and vivid. He loved antitheses. It is a peculiarity of his style that he indulges in dramatic interruptions and answers; e.g. 2 5.12; 3 1; 6 6-8; 7 14f. He also loves historical references; as e.g. 1 13.15; 5 5; 6 4f.6.16; 7 20. He makes frequent use of the image of the shepherd, 2 12; 3 2f; 4 6; 5 3 f; 7 14. The fact that these peculiarities appear in all parts of his little book is an argument in favor of its being from one author. He is superior to Isaiah in his tendency to idyllic details, and esp. in a deeper personal sympathy, which generally finds expression in an elegiac strain. His lyrical style readily takes the form of a prayer or of a psalm (cf ch 7).

MICAH, mī-kā'ya, mī-kī'a (מִיכָאֵל, mī-khāyāhū, "who is like Jeh?"; Μεχάλας, Meichaias): A frequently occurring OT name occasionally contracted to MICA or MICAH (q.v.). In AV it is usually spelled "Michaiah."

(1) The mother of Abijah (2 Ch 13 2, AV "Michaiah"). The || passage (1 K 15 2; cf 2 Ch 11 20) indicates that Micaiah here is a corruption of MAACAH (q.v.) (so LXX).

(2) The father of Achbor (2 K 22 12, AV "Michaiah"). See MICAH, (5).

(3) A prince of Judah sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 7, AV "Michaiah").

(4) The son of Zaccur, a priestly processionist at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 35, AV "Michaiah").

(5) A priestly processionist at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 41; wanting in LXX).

(6) The canonical prophet. See MICAH, (7), and special article.

(7) The son of Imlah, the chief character of an important episode near the end of the reign of Ahab (1 K 22 4-28 || 2 Ch 18 3-27). In the Heb. his name appears once in the contracted form "Micah" (2 Ch 18 14). Ahab had suggested to his visitor, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, that they should undertake a joint campaign against Ramoth-gilead. Jehoshaphat politely acquiesced, but asked that the mind of Jeh should first be ascertained. Ahab forthwith summoned the official prophets, to the number of 400, into the royal presence. Obsequious to their master, they, both by oracular utterance and by the symbolic action of their leader, Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, gave the king a favorable answer. Their ready chorus of assent seems to have made Jehoshaphat suspicious, for he pleaded that further guidance be sought. Micaiah, for whom Ahab, then, with evident reluctance, sent, at first simply repeated the favorable response of the 400; but adjoined by the king to speak the whole truth, he dropped his ironical tone, and in sad earnest described a vision of disaster. Ahab endeavored to lessen the effect of this oracle by pettishly complaining that Micaiah was always to him a prophet of evil. The latter thereupon related an impressive vision of the heavenly court, whence he had seen a lying spirit dispatched by Jeh to the prophets in order to bring about Ahab's delusion and downfall. In answer to a rude challenge from Zedekiah, who acted as spokesman for the 400, Micaiah confidently appealed to the issue for proof of the truth of his prediction, and was promptly committed to prison by the king.

The narrative is exceedingly vivid and of the utmost interest to students of Israelitish prophecy. Several of its details have given rise to discussion, and the questions: How far were the prophet's visions objective? How far did he admit the inspiration of his opponents? Is the Divine action described consistent with the holy character of Jeh? have occasioned difficulty to many. But their difficulty arises largely either because of their Christian viewpoint, or because of their hard and mechanical theory of prophetic inspiration. Micaiah's position was a delicate one. Foreboding or foreseeing disaster, he did his best to avert it. This he could do only by weaning the king from the influence of the 400 time-serving prophets. He sought to gain his end; first, by an ironical acquiescence in their favorable answer, then, by a short oracle forecasting disaster esp. to Ahab; and, these means having failed by discrediting in the most solemn manner the courtly prophets opposed to him. Thus regarded, his vision contains no admission of their equal inspiration; rather is it an emphatic declaration that these men were uttering falsehood in Jeh's name, thereby endangering their country's safety and their king's life. Their obsequious time-service made them fit forerunners of the false prophets denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 23 9-40) and by Ezekiel (Ezk 13 1-15). The frank anthropomorphism of the vision need be no stumbling-block if allowed to drop into its proper place as the literary device of a prophet intensely conscious of his own inspiration and as wholeheartedly patriotic as those opposed to him.

The record ends very abruptly, giving no account of Micaiah's vindication when at length the course of events brought about the fulfilment of his prediction. The closing words, "Hear, ye peoples, all of you" (1 K 22 28 || 2 Ch 18 27), a quotation of Mic 1 2, are an evident interpolation by some late scribe who confused the son of Imlah with the contemporary of Isaiah.

(5) A son of Izrahiah of Issachar (1 Ch 7 3).

(6) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 16).

(7) A Manassite who ceded to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 20).

(8) The father of Omri of Issachar (1 Ch 27 18).

(9) A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21 2).

(10) The father of Zebediah, an exile who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 8 || 1 Esd 8 34).

(11) "The archangel" (Jude ver 9). Probably also the unnamed archangel of 1 Thess 4 16 is Michael. In the OT he is mentioned by name only in Dnl. He is "one of the chief princes" (Dnl 10 13), the "prince" of Israel (10 21), "the great prince" (12 1); perhaps also "the prince of the host" (8 11). In all these passages Michael appears as the heavenly patron and champion of Israel; as the watchful guardian of the people of God against all foes earthly or devilish. In the uncanonical apocalyptic writings, however, Jewish angelology is further developed. In them Michael frequently appears and exercises functions similar to those which are ascribed to him in Dnl. He is the first of the "four presences that stand before God"—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel or Phanuel (En 9 1; 40 9). In other apocryphal books and even elsewhere in En, the number of archangels is given as 7 (En 20 1-7; Tob 12 15; cf also Rev 8 2). Among the many characterizations of Michael the following may be noted: He is "the merciful and long-suffering" (En 40 9; 68 2.3).

"the mediator and intercessor" (Asc Isa, Lat VS 9 23; Test. XII P, Levi 5; Dan 6). It is he who opposed the devil in a dispute concerning Moses' body (Jude ver 9). This passage, according to most modern authorities, is derived from the apocryphal Asm M (see Charles's ed, 105-10). It is Michael also who leads the angelic armies in the war in heaven against "the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan" (Rev 12 7 ff). According to Charles, the supplanting of the "child" by the archangel is an indication of the Jewish origin of this part of the book.

The earlier Protestant scholars usually identified Michael with the preincarnate Christ, finding support for their view, not only in the juxtaposition of the "child" and the archangel in Rev 12, but also in the attributes ascribed to him in Dnl (for a full discussion see Hengstenberg, Offenbarung, I, 611-22, and an interesting survey in English by Dr. Douglas in Fairbairn's BD). MICHAH, mī'ka. See MICAH.

MICHAIAH, mī-kā'ya, mī-kī'a. See MICAIAH.

MICHAL, mī'kal (מִיכָל, mīkhāl, contracted from מִיכָאֵל, mīkhā'el, "Michael" [q.v.]; מֵלֶכְוֹל, Melchōl): Saul's younger daughter (1 S 14 49), who, falling in love with David after his victory over Goliath (1 S 18 20), was at last, on the payment of double the dowry asked, married to him (1 S 18 27). Her love was soon put to the test. When Saul in his jealousy sent for David, she was quick to discern her husband's danger, connived at his escape, and not only outwitted and delayed the messengers, but afterward also soothed her father's jealous wrath (1 S 19 11-17). When David was outlawed and exiled, she was married to Palti or Paltiel, the son of Laish of Gallim (1 S 25 44), but was, despite Palti's sorrowful protest, forcibly restored to David on his return as king (2 S 3 14-16). The next scene in which she figures indicates that her love had cooled and had even turned to disdain, for after David's enthusiastic joy and ecstatic dancing before the newly restored Ark of the Covenant, she received him with bitter and scornful mockery (2 S 6 20), and the record closes with the fact that she remained all her life childless (2 S 6 23; cf 2 S 21 8 where Michal is an obvious mistake for Merab). Michal was evidently a woman of unusual strength of mind and decision of character. She manifested her love in an age when it was almost an unheard-of thing for a woman to take the initiative in such a matter. For the sake of the man whom she loved too she braved her father's wrath and risked her own life. Even her later mockery of David affords proof of her courage, and almost suggests the inference that she had resented being treated as a chattel and thrown from one husband to another. The modern reader can scarce withhold from her, if not admiration, at least a slight tribute of sympathy. JOHN A. LEES

MICHEAS, mī-kē'as (MICHAELAS): In 2 Esd 1 39=the prophet Micah.

MICHMAS, mīk'mas (מִיכְמָס, mīkhmās; Β, Μαχμάς, Machmās, Α, Χαμμάς, Chammās): The form of the name "Michmash" found in Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31. In 1 Esd 5 21 it appears as MACALON (q.v.).

MICHMASH, mīk'mash (מִיכְמָשׁ, mīkhmāsh; Μαχμάς, Machmās): A town in the territory of Benjamin, apparently not of sufficient importance to secure mention in the list of cities given in Josh 18 21 ff. It first appears as occupied by Saul with 2,000 men, when Jonathan, advancing from Gibeah, smote the Philistines in Geba (1 S 13 2). To avenge this injury, the Philistines came up in force and pitched in Michmash (ver 5). Saul and Jonathan with 600 men held Geba, which had been taken from the Philistines (ver 16). It will assist in making clear the narrative if, at this point, the natural features of the place are described.

Pass of Michmash.

Michmash is represented by the mod. Mukhmās, about 7 miles N. of Jerus. From the main road which runs close to the watershed, a valley sloping eastward sinks swiftly into the great gorge of Wādī es-Suweinīl. The village of Mukhmās stands to the N. of the gorge, about 4 miles E. of the carriage road. The ancient path from Ai southward passes to the W. of the village, goes down into the valley by a steep and difficult track, and crosses the gorge by the pass, a narrow defile, with lofty, precipitous crags on either side—the only place where a crossing is practicable. To the S. of the gorge is Geba, which had been occupied by the Philistines, doubtless to command the pass. Their camp was probably pitched in a position E. of Mukhmās, where the ground slopes gradually northward from the edge of the gorge. The place is described by Jos as "upon a precipice with three peaks, ending in a small, but sharp and long extremity, while there was a rock that surrounded them like bulwarks to prevent the attack of the enemy" (Ant, VI, vi, 2). Conder confirms this description, speaking of it as "a high hill bounded by the precipices of Wādī es-Suweinīl on the S., rising in three flat but narrow mounds, and communicating with the hill of Mukhmās, which is much lower, by a long and narrow ridge." The Philistines purposed to guard the pass against approach from the S. On the other hand they were not eager to risk an encounter with the badly armed Israelites in a position where superior numbers would be of little advantage. It was while the armies lay thus facing each other across the gorge that Jonathan and his armor-bearer performed their intrepid feat (1 S 14 1 ff). See BOZZE; SENEK.

It will be noted that the Philistines brought their chariots to Michmash (1 S 13 5). In his ideal picture of the Assyrian advance on Jerus, Isaiah makes the invader lay up his baggage at Michmash so that he might go lightly through the pass (10 28). A company of the men of Michmash (see MICMAS) returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31). Michmash produced excellent barley. According to the Mish, "to bring barley to Michmash" was equivalent to our Eng. "to carry coal to Newcastle." Michmash was the seat of government under Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc 9 73).

The modern village is stone-built. There are rock-cut tombs to the N. Cisterns supply the water. There are foundations of old buildings, large stones, and a vaulted cistern. W. EWING

MICHMETHAH, mik'mē-tha (מִיכְמֶתָחַ, hakhmēthāh; B, Ἰκασμὸν, Hikasmōn, A, Μαχθά, Machthōth): A place named in defining the territory of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh 16 6; 17 7). It is said to lie "before," i.e. to the E. of Shechem. In the name itself, the meaning of which is obscure, there is nothing to guide us. The presence of the art., however ("the Michmethah"), suggests that it may not be a proper name, but an appellative, applying to some feature of the landscape. Conder suggests the plain of Makhneh, which lies to the E. of Nāblus (Shechem), in which there may possibly be an echo of the ancient name.

MICHRI, mik'rī (מִכְרִי, mikhri): A Benjamite dweller in Jerus (1 Ch 9 8).

MICHTAM, mik'tam. See PSALMS.

MIDDAY, mid'dā (מִדְּיָחַ, maḥāḡil ha-yōm, מִדְּיָחַ, ṣōḥrayim; ἡμέρα μέση, hēmera mēsē): The Heb maḥāḡil ha-yōm (Neh 8 3) and the Gr hēmeras mesēs (Acts 26 13) are strictly the middle of the day, but the Heb ṣōḥrayim is a dual form from צָהָר, ṣōhar, meaning "light," hence light or brightness, i.e. the brightest part of the day (1 K 18 29). See NOON.

MIDDIN, mid'in (מִדִּין, middin; in GB, Αἰνών, Ainōn, "springs"): One of the six cities in the wilderness of Judah (Josh 15 61). There are not many possible sites. The Heb name may possibly survive in Kh. Mird, a very conspicuous site with many ancient cisterns overlooking the plateau el Bukea, above which it towers to a height of 1,000 ft.; it is the Mons Mardes of early Christian pilgrims; the existing remains are Byzantine. It is a site of great natural strength and was clearly once a place of some importance. The Gr reading Ainōn, "place of springs," suggests the neighborhood of the extensive oasis of 'Ain Feshkhah at the northwest corner of the Dead Sea where there are at Kh. Kumrīn remains of buildings and a rock-cut aqueduct. See PEF, III, 210, 212, Sh XVIII.

MIDIAN, mid'i-an, MIDIANITES, mid'i-an-its (מִדְיָן, midhyān, מִדְיָנִים, midhyānīm; Μαδιάν, Madīām, Μαδιανῶται, Madīanaiōi):

1. The Seed Midian was a son of Abraham by his of Abraham concubine Keturah. To him were to the Time born 5 sons, Ephah, Ephher, Hanoch, of the Abida and Eldaah (Gen 25 24; 1 Judges Ch 1 32 f). Bearing gifts from Abraham, he and his brothers, each with his own household, moved off from Isaac into "the east country" (Gen 25 6). The first recorded incident in the history of the tribe is a defeat suffered "in the field of Moab" at the hands of Hadad, king of Edom. Of this nothing beyond the fact is known (36 35; 1 Ch 1 46). The Midianites next appear as merchantmen traveling from Gilead to Egypt, with "spicery and balm and myrrh," with no prejudice against a turn of slave-dealing (Gen 37 25 ff). Moses, on fleeing from Egypt, found refuge in the land of Midian, and became son-in-law of Jethro, the priest of Midian (Ex 2 15.21). In Midian Moses received his commission to Israel in Egypt (4 19). A Midianite, familiar with the desert, acted as guide ("instead of eyes") to the children of Israel in their wilderness wanderings

(Nu 10 29 ff). The friendly relations between Israel and Midian, which seem to have prevailed at first, had been ruptured, and we find the elders of Midian acting with those of Moab in calling Balaam to curse Israel (22 4-7). Because of the grievous sin into which they had seduced Israel on the shrewd advice of Balaam, a war of vengeance was made against the Midianites in which five of their chiefs perished; the males were ruthlessly slain, and Balaam also was put to death (25 15.17; 31 2 ff). We next hear of Midian as oppressing Israel for 7 years. Along with the Amalekites and the children of the East they swarmed across the Jordan, and their multitudinous beasts swept up the produce of the earth. Overwhelming disaster befell this horde at the onset of Gideon's chosen men. In the battle and pursuit "there fell a hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword"; their kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, and their princes, Oreb and Zeeb, sharing the common fate (Jgs 6-8). Echoes of this glorious victory—"the day of Midian"—are heard in later lit. (Ps 83 9; Isa 9 4; 10 26; Hab 3 7).

The Kenites appear to have been a branch of the Midianites. Jethro could hardly have attained the dignity of the priesthood in Midian had he been of alien blood (Jgs 1 16). 2. The Kenite See KENITES. Again, the tribesmen are named indifferently Ishmaelites and Midianites (Gen 37 25.28.36; Jgs 8 22.24). They must therefore have stood in close relations with the descendants of Hagar's son.

The representations of Midian in Scripture are consistent with what we know of the immemorial ways of Arabian tribes, now engaged in pastoral pursuits, again as carriers of merchandise, and yet again as freebooters. Such tribes often roam through wide circles. They appear not to have practised circumcision (Ex 4 25), which is now practically universal among the Arabs. The men wore golden ornaments, as do the modern nomads (Jgs 8 24 ff).

The name of "Midian" is not found in Egypt or Assyrian documents. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies? 304) suggests that Ephah (Gen 25 4) may be identical with Hayapa of the cuneiform inscriptions. If this is correct the references point to the existence of this Midianite tribe in the N. of el-Hijāz in the times of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon (745-705 BC). Isaiah speaks of Midian and Ephah apparently as separate tribes, whose dromedaries bear gold and frankincense to Zion (60 6); but he gives no hint of the districts they occupied. The tribe of Ghifār, found in the neighborhood of Medina in Mohammed's day, Knobel would identify with Ephher, another of Midian's sons.

No boundaries can now be assigned to "the land of Midian." It included territory on the W. as well as on the E. of the Gulf of 'Akaba 5. Territory (Ex 4 19). It lay between Edom and Paran (1 K 11 18). In the time of the Judges their district seems to have extended northward to the E. of Gilead (8 10).

A trace of the ancient name is found in that of Madyan, a place mentioned by the Arab geographers, with a plentiful supply of water, now called Maghāir Sho'ab. It lies E. of the Gulf of 'Akaba, some miles from the coast, almost opposite the point of the Sinaitic peninsula. The name Sho'ab, given by Mohammed to Jethro, may here be due to ancient Midianite tradition.

MIDIANITISH, mid'i-an-it-ish, WOMAN (מִדְיָנִיָּה, ha-midhyānīth, "the Midianitess"): The designation given to the daughter of Zur, Cozbi, whom Zimri the son of Salu brought into the camp of Israel (Nu 25 6-18). Both were of noble parentage (25 14.15). The majority of the people strongly resented this act of profanation (25 6). A pestilence was raging in the camp, and Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, in an outburst of zeal pursued the two delinquents and slew them by a spear-thrust through their bodies (25 8). He obtained as a reward the immediate staying of the plague and the promise of perpetual priesthood to his family (25 8.13). JOHN A. LEES

MIDNIGHT, mid'nit (חצוֹת לַיְלָה, hăcōth laylāh, "middle of the night" [Ex 11 4; Job 34 20; Ps 119 62], חֲצִי הַלַּיְלָה, hăcī ha-laylāh, "the half of the night" [Ex 12 29; Jgs 16 3; Ruth 3 8], חֲצִי הַלַּיְלָה, tōkh ha-laylāh, "the division of the night" and hence the middle point [1 K 3 20]; μέσος νυκτός, mēsēs nuktós [Mt 25 6], or μέσον τῆς νυκτός, mēson tēs nuktós, "the middle of the night" [Acts 27 27], μεσονύκτιος, mesonūktios, "midnight"; WH, mesonūktion [Acts 16 25, etc]): In the period before the exile midnight does not seem to have been very accurately determined. The division of the night was into three watches, the middle one of which included midnight. In NT times the four-watch division was used where midnight must have been more or less accurately determined. See TIME; WATCH. H. PORTER

MIDRASH, mid'rash (מִדְרָשׁ, midhrāsh): The Heb word corresponding to AV "story" and RV "commentary" in 2 Ch 13 22; 24 27. A mid-rash is properly a story developed for purposes of edification. See COMMENTARY.

MIDWIFE, mid'wif (מִיָּלְדֶּה, m'yalledeth): Those who in patriarchal times attended mothers at childbirth are so named in Gen 35 17; 38 28; Ex 1 15-22. Such attendants were probably then (1 S 4 20), as they usually are now, the older female relatives and friends of the mother. The duties which they had to perform are enumerated in Ezk 16 4: division of the cord, washing the infant in water, salting with salt and swathing in swaddling clothes. During the Egypt bondage there were two midwives who attended the Heb women; from their names, they were probably Hebrews, certainly they were not Egyptians. From this passage it appears that they used a certain double-round form of birthstool called 'obhnāyim, concerning which there are several rabbinical comments. It probably was like the kurā elwidādeh, or "birth-seat," still used by the Egypt fellahin. I have not found any record of its use among the Palestinian fellahin. There is a curious passage in the Talm (Sotāh 2b) in which it is said that the two midwives had different duties, Shiphrah being the one who dressed the infant, Puah, the one who whispered to it. One Jewish commentator on this supposes that Puah used artificial respiration by blowing into the child's mouth. The midwives must have had considerable skill, as a case like that of Tamar required some amount of operative manipulation.

The Eng. word means originally the woman who is "with the mother" (cf "the women that stood by," 1 S 4 20), but very early became applied to those who gave skilled assistance, as in Raynold's Birth of Mankind, 1565. ALEX. MACALISTER

MIGDAL-EDER, mig-dal-ē'dēr. See EDER.

MIGDAL-EL, mig-dal-el (מִגְדַּל־אֵל, mighdal-'ēl; B, Μεγαλαρεῖμ, Megalaareim, A, Μαγδαλιτωράμ, Magdaliēōrām): The name, which means "tower of God," occurs between Iron and Horem in the list of the fenced cities of Naphtali (Josh 19 38). Onom places it 9 miles from Dora (Ṭanūrah), on the way to Ptolemais, which points to Ahlūt. But this is far from the territory of Naphtali. It is probably to be identified with either Khirbet Mejdel, 3 miles N. of Kedes, or Mejdel Islim, 5 miles farther to the N.W.

MIGDAL-GAD, mig-dal-gad (מִגְדַּל־גָּד, mighdal-gadh, "tower of Gad"): One of a group of 16 cities of Judah situated in the "lowland" (Josh 15 37). Of these, only Lachish, Eglon, Beth-dagon and Naamah have been identified with any certainty. This would indicate a site in the Phili plain, and the modern flourishing town of Mejdel, 2½ miles N.E. of Ashkelon, appears to be a possible identification. It is the most important town in the district which is named after it Nahiet el-Mejdel. It must, however, be admitted that it is difficult to see how Judah could have held a site so close to the great Phili strongholds. It is very probable that Mejdel ("tower") is the tower mentioned in Jos, BJ, III, ii, 3, as close to Ashkelon, and it or Migdal-gad (or both if they are the same sites) may be identical with the Magtal of the Am Tab (Petrie, Hist. Egypt, II, 329). For Mejdel see PEF, II, 410, Sh XVI. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MIGDOL, mig'dol, mig'döl (מִגְדֹּל, mighdöl; Μαγδόλον, Magdōlon): This name ("the tower") is applied to two places on the east frontier of Egypt.

(1) In Ex 14 2; Nu 33 7, the Heb camp, on the march from Etham after they had "turned" (apparently to the S.), is defined as "facing 1. Ex 14:2; Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the Nu 33:7 sea, over against Baal-zephon." It is thus to be sought (see EXODUS) W. of the Bitter Lakes, and may have been a watchtower on the spur of Jebel 'Atakah. Israel was supposed to be "entangled in the land," and shut in in the "wilderness," between this range and the Bitter Lakes, then forming the head of the Red Sea. The exact site is unknown. In about 385 AD, St. Silvia, traveling from Clymsa (Suez), was shown the sites above mentioned on her way to Heroopolis, but none of these names now survive.

(2) In Jer 44 1; 46 14, a Migdol is noticed with Memphis, and with Tahpanhes (LXX "Taphnas"), this latter being supposed to be the 2. Jer 44:1; Daphnai of Gr writers, now Tell 46:14 Defeneh, W. of Kanarah. The same place is probably intended in Ezk 29 10; 30 6 (cf vs 15-18), the borders of Egypt being defined as reaching "from Migdol to Syene" (see RVm), as understood by the LXX translators. The Antonine Itinerary places Migdol 12 miles S. of Pelusium, and the site appears to have been at or near Tell es Samūt, the Egypt name, according to Brugsch (Hist, II, 351), being Samut. This Migdol was thus apparently a "watchtower" on the main road along the coast from Pal, which is called (Ex 13 17) "the way of the land of the Philis," entering Egypt near Daphnai.

These sites not identical.—We are specially told that this was not the route taken at the exodus, and this Migdol cannot therefore be the same as (1), though Brugsch, in consequence of a theory as to the exodus which has not been accepted by other scholars, has confused the two sites, as apparently does the Antonine Itinerary when placing Pithom on the same route leading to Zoan. Brugsch (Geography, III, 19) supposes the Egypt town name Pa-Ma'kāl (with the determinative for "wall" added) to stand for Migdol, but the prefix Pa ("city") seems to show that this word is purely native, and not Sem, to say nothing of philological objections. This town may, however, have lain in the required direction, according to a scribe's report of the time of Seti II (or about 1230 BC).

As much confusion has been created by quoting this report as illustrative of the exodus, the actual words according to Brugsch's tr may be given (Hist. II, 132): "I set out from the hall of the royal palace on the 9th day of Epiphi, in the evening, after the two servants. I arrived at the fortress Thuku (T-k-u) on the 10th of Epiphi. I was informed that the men had resolved to take their way toward the S. On the 12th I reached Khetam. There I was informed that grooms who had come from the neighborhood [of the "sedge city"] reported that the fugitives had already passed the rampart (Anbu or "wall"), to the N. of the Ma'ktal of King Seti Minpethah." As to the position of this "wall," see SAUR.

C. R. CONDER

MIGRON, mig'ron (מִגְרוֹן, mighrōn; Μαγών, Magōn):

(1) A place in the uttermost part of Geba—which read here instead of Gibeah—marked by a pomegranate tree, where Saul and his 600 men encamped over against the Philis, who were in Michmash (1 S 14 2). Jos describes the distress of Saul and his company as they sat on a high hill (bounós hupsēlós) viewing the widespread desolation wrought by the enemy. There is, however, nothing to guide us as to the exact spot. Many suppose that the text is corrupt; but no emendation suggested yields any satisfactory result. The place was certainly S. of Michmash.

(2) (B, Μαγεδών, Magedō, A, Μαγεδδών, Mageddō): The Migron of Isa 10 28 is mentioned between Aiath (Ai) and Michmash. If the places are there named in consecutive order, this Migron must be sought to the N. of Michmash. It may with some confidence be located at Makrūn, a ruined site to the N. of the road leading from Michmash to Ai.

There is nothing extraordinary in two places having the same name pretty close to each other. The two Beth-horons, although distinguished as upper and lower, are a case in point. So also are the two Bethsaidas. There is therefore no need to try to identify the two with one another, as some (e.g. Robertson Smith in Journal of Philol., XIII, 62 ff) have attempted to do with no success.

W. EWING

MIJAMIN, mij'a-min (מִיָּאִמִּין, miyāmīn; AV Miamin):

(1) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 25). He is also called Maelus (1 Esd 9 26).

(2) The one to whom fell the lot for the 6th priestly course (1 Ch 24 9). His family returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua (Neh 12 5).

(3) A signatory of the Covenant (Neh 10 7).

MIKLOTH, mik'loth, mik'lōth (מִקְלוֹת, miklōth):

(1) A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (1 Ch 8 32; 9 37.38). A comparison of the two passages shows that the name Mikloth has been dropped at the end of 1 Ch 8 31.

(2) An officer designated "the ruler," appointed in the priestly course for the 2d month (1 Ch 27 4).

MIKNEIAH, mik-nē'ya, mik-nī'a (מִקְנֵיָאֵה, miknēyāhū): A Levite doorkeeper (1 Ch 15 18).

MILALAI, mil-a-lā'i, mil'a-lī (מִלְלָי, milālay): A Levite musician (Neh 12 36).

MILCAH, mil'ka (מִלְכָּה, milkāh; Μελχά, Melchā):

(1) Daughter of Haran, wife of Nahor, and grandmother of Rebekah (Gen 11 29; 22 20-23; 24 15.24 47).

(2) Daughter of Zelophehad (Nu 26 33; 27 1; 36 11; Josh 17 3). Many recent authorities are of

MILCOM, mil'kom, mil'kōm. See MOLECH.

MILDEW, mil'dū (יֶרֶקָה, yērākōn; LXX usually ἰκτερος, ikteros, lit. "jaundice"): In the 5 passages where it occurs it is associated with shiddāphōn, "blasting" (Dt 28 22; 1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Am 4 9; Hag 2 17). In Jer 30 6, the same word is tr'd "paleness," the yellow color of one with abdominal disease. The root-meaning is "greenish yellow"; of the Arab. يَرْقَان, yarkān, meaning both "jaundice" and "blight." Mildew or "rust" in corn is due to a special fungus, Puccinia graminis, whose life is divided between the barberry and cereals. Many other varieties of fungi which flourish upon other plants are also designated "mildew." See BLASTING. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MILE, mil (μῖλον, milion, Lat mille passus, milia passuum): A thousand paces, equal to 1,618 Eng. yds. (Mt 5 41). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MILETUS, mī-lē'tus (Μῆλος, Mīlētos): A famous early Ionian Gr city on the coast of Caria, near the mouth of the Meander River, which, according to Acts 20 15-21 1, and 2 Tim 4 20 (AV "Miletum"), Paul twice visited. In the earliest times it was a prominent trading post, and it is said that 75 colonies were founded by its merchants. Among them were Abydos, Cyzicus and Sinope. In 494 BC, the city was taken by the Persians; it was recovered by Alexander the Great, but after his time it rapidly declined, yet it continued to exist until long after the Christian era. In the history of early Christianity it plays but a little part. The Meander brings down a considerable amount of sediment which it has deposited at its mouth, naturally altering the coast line. The gulf into which the river flows has thus been nearly filled with the deposit. In the ancient gulf stood a little island called Lade; the island now appears as a mound in the marshy malarial plain, and Palatia, the modern village which stands on the site of Miletus, is 6 miles from the coast. Without taking into account the great changes in the coast line it would be difficult to understand Acts 20 15-21, for in the days of Paul, Ephesus could be reached from Miletus by land only by making a long détour about the head of the gulf. To go directly from one of these cities to the other, one would have been obliged to cross the gulf by boat and then continue by land. This is what Paul's messenger probably did. The direct journey may now be made by land. Miletus has been so ruined that its plan can no longer be made out. Practically the only remaining object of unusual interest is the theater, the largest in Asia Minor, which was not built in a hollow of the hillside, as most ancient theaters were, but in the open field.

MILK, milk (חָלָב, hālābh; γάλα, gála; Lat lac [2 Esd 2 19; 8 10]): The fluid secreted by the mammary glands of female mammals for the nourishment of their young. The word is used in the Bible of that of human beings (Isa 28 9) as well as of that of the lower animals (Ex 23 19). As a food it ranked next in importance to bread (Ecclus 39 26). Pal is frequently described as a land "flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3 8.17; Nu 13 27; Dt 6 3; Josh 5 6; Jer 11 5; Ezk 20 6.15). Milk was among the first things set before the weary traveler (Gen 18 8). In fact, it was considered a luxury (Jgs 5 25; Cant 5 1). The people used the milk of kine and also that of sheep (Dt 32 14), and esp. that of goats (Prov 27 27). It was received in pails ('āṣinīm, Job 21 24), and kept in leather bottles (nō'dh, Jgs 4 19), where it turned sour quickly in the warm climate of Pal before being poured out thickly like a melting substance (nā'hakh; cf Job 10 10). Cheese of various kinds was made from it (g'bhīnāh and hāriṣe he-hālābh, lit. "cuts of milk"); or the curds (hem'āh) were eaten with bread, and possibly also made into butter by churning (Prov 30 33). See Food, II. It is possible that milk was used for seething other substances; at least the Israelites were strictly forbidden to seethe a kid in its mother's milk (Ex 23 19; 34 26; Dt 14 21), and by a very general interpretation of these passages Jews have come to abstain from the use of mixtures of meat and milk of all kinds.

Figuratively the word is used (1) of abundance (Gen 49 12); (2) of a loved one's charms (Cant 4 11); (3) of blessings (Isa 55 1; Joel 3 18); (4) of the (spiritual) food of immature people (1 Cor 3 2; He 5 12,13); (5) of purity (1 Pet 2 2).

MILL, mil, MILLSTONE, mil'stōn (מִלִּין, mīlīn; μύλος, mýlos, μύλον, mýlōn, mūlōn): The two most primitive methods of grinding grain were (1) by pounding it in a mortar, and (2) by rubbing it between two stones. In Nu 11 8 both methods are mentioned as used for rendering the manna more fit for cooking. Numerous examples of both mill and mortar have been found in ancient excavations. Bliss and Macalister in their excavations at Gezer and other places have found specimens of what is called the saddle-quern or mill, which consists of two stones. The "nether" stone, always made of hard lava or basalt from the district of the Hauran, was a large heavy slab varying in length from 1½ ft. to 2½ ft., and in width from 10 in. to 1½ ft. Its upper surface was hollowed out slightly, which made it look a little like a saddle and may have suggested the name of "riding millstone" applied by the Hebrews to the upper stone which rested on it (Jgs 9 53). The "upper stone" or "rider" was much smaller, 4 in. to 8 in. long and 2½ in. to 6 in. wide, and of varying shapes. This could be seized with the two hands and rubbed back and forth over the nether stone much the same as clothes are scrubbed on a wash-board. Such a stone could be used as a weapon (Jgs 9 53; 2 S 11 21), or given as a pledge (Dt 24 6).

Macalister goes so far as to say that "the rotary hand-quern in the form used in modern Pal and in remote European regions, such as the Hebrides, is quite unknown throughout the whole history, even down to the time of Christ" (Excavations at Gezer). The same writer, however, describes some mills belonging to the 3d and 4th Sem periods which are much like the present rotary quern, except smaller (4 in. to 6 in. in diameter), and with no provision for a turning handle. Schumacher describes these as paint grinders. The only perforated upper millstones found in the excavations at Gezer belong to the early Arab. period.

If the above assertions are substantiated then we must alter somewhat the familiar picture of the two women at the mill (Mt 24 41), commonly illustrated by photographs of the mills still used in modern Pal. These latter consist of two stone discs each 18 in. to 20 in. in diameter, usually made of Hauran basalt. The upper one is perforated in the center to allow it to rotate on a wooden peg fixed in the nether stone, and near the circumference of the upper stone is fixed a wooden handle for turning it. The grain to be ground is fed into the central hole on the upper stone and gradually works down between the stones. As the grain is reduced to flour, it flies out from between the stones on to a cloth or skin placed underneath the mill. To make the flour fine it is reground and sifted. Larger stones 4 ft. to 5 ft. in diameter, working on the principle of the handmill, are still used for grinding sesame seed. These are turned by asses or mules. Another form of mill, which is possibly referred to in Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42; Rev 18 21,22, consisted of a conical nether stone on which "rode" a second stone like a hollowed-out capstan. The upper stone was probably turned with handspikes in much the same way as an old-fashioned ship's capstan was turned. The material to be ground was fed into the upper cone which formed the hopper and from which it was delivered to the grinding surfaces between the "rider" and the nether stone. This form of mill must have been known in late Bib. times, because many examples of the upper stone dating from the Gr-Rom period have been found. One may be seen in the museum of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut. Another large one lies among the ruins at Petra, etc. In Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42, the mill is described as a μύλος ονικός, mýlos onikós, lit. a mill turned by an ass, hence a great millstone. It is not at all unlikely that the writers have confused the meaning of δνος, ónos (ὄνος, hómōn), a term commonly applied to the upper millstone of a handmill, thinking it referred instead to the animal which turned the mill. This explanation would make Christ's words of condemnation more applicable. The upper millstone of a handmill would be more than sufficient to sink the condemned, and the punishment would be more easily carried out. A few years from now hand-mills will have disappeared from the Syrian households, for the more modern gristmills turned by water or other motor power are rapidly replacing them. See Crafts, II, 8.

Figuratively: (1) Of firmness and undaunted courage (Job 41 24). "The heart of hot-blooded animals is liable to sudden contractions and expansions, producing rapid alternations of sensations; not so the heart of the great saurians" (Canon Cook ad loc.). (2) To "grind the face of the poor" (Isa 3 15) is cruelly to oppress and afflict them. (3) The ceasing of the sound of the millstone was a sign of desolation (Jer 25 10; Rev 18 22).

The great majority of evangelical Christians believe that the kingdom of God shall have universal sway over the earth, and that righteousness and peace and the knowledge of the Lord shall everywhere prevail. This happy time is commonly called the Millennium, or the thousand years' reign. Divergent views are entertained as to how it is to be brought about. Many honest and faithful men hold that it will be introduced by the agencies now at work, mainly by the preaching of the gospel of Christ and the extension of the church over the world. An increasing number of men equally honest teach that the Millennium will be established by the visible advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. The aim of this brief article is to set forth some of the Scriptural grounds on which this latter view rests. No reference will be made to objections, to counter-objections and interpretations; the single point, namely, that the Millennium succeeds the second coming of Jesus Christ, that it does not precede it, will be rigidly adhered to. Those who hold this view believe that neither Christ nor His apostles taught, on fair principles of interpretation, that the Millennium must come before His advent.

1. The Teaching of Jesus.—The Lord Jesus said nothing about world-wide conversion in His instructions to His disciples touching their mission (Mt 28 19,20; Mk 16 15; Lk 24 46-48; Acts 1 8). They were to be His witnesses and carry His message to the race, but He does not promise the race will receive their testimony, or that men will generally accept His salvation. On the contrary, He explicitly forewarns them that they shall be hated of all men, that sufferings and persecutions shall be their lot, but if they are faithful to the end their reward will be glorious. But world-wide evangelism does not mean world-wide conversion. The universal offer of salvation does not pledge its universal acceptance. In His instructions and predictions the Lord does not let fall a hint that their world-wide mission will result in world-wide conversion, or that thereby the longed-for Millennium will be ushered in. But there is a time to come when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters the sea, when teaching shall no longer be needed, for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest. Our dispensation, accordingly, cannot be the last, for the effects stated in that are not contemplated in the instructions and the results of this. To the direct revelation of Christ on the subject we now turn. In two parables He explicitly announces the general character and the consummation of the gospel age, and these we are briefly to examine.

(1) Parable of the Wheat and Tares (Mt 13 24-30,36-43).—Happily we are not left to discover the meaning and scope of this parable. We enjoy the immense advantage of having Our Lord's own interpretation of it. Out of His Divine explanation certain most important facts emerge: (a) The parable covers the whole period between the first and second advents of the Saviour. The Sower is Christ Himself. He began the good work; He opened the new era. (b) The field is the world. Christ's work is no longer confined to a single nation or people as once; it contemplates the entire race. (c) His people, the redeemed, begotten by His word and Spirit, are the good seed. Through them the gospel of His grace is to be propagated throughout the whole world. (d) The devil is also a sower. He is the foul counterfeiter of God's work. He sowed the tares, the sons of the evil one. (e)

The tares are not wicked men in general, but a particular class of wicked brought into close and contaminating association with the children of God. "Within the territory of the visible church the tares are deposited" (Dr. David Brown). It is the corruption of Christendom that is meant, a gigantic fact to which we cannot shut our eyes. (f) The mischief, once done, cannot be corrected. "Let both grow together until the harvest." Christendom once corrupted remains so to the end. (g) The harvest is the consummation of the age. This is the culmination of our age; it terminates with the advent and judgment of the Son of God. He will send forth His angels who will "gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire. . . . Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

Here, then, we have the beginning, progress and consummation of our age. Christ Himself introduced it, and it was distinguished for its purity and its excellence. But the glorious system of truth was soon marred by the cunning craftiness of Satan. No after-vigilance or earnestness on the part of the servants could repair the fatal damage. They were forbidden to attempt the removal of the tares, for by so doing they would endanger the good grain, so intermixed had the two become! The expulsion of the tares is left for angels' hands in the day of the harvest. This is Our Lord's picture of our age: a Zizanian field wherein good and bad, children of God and children of the evil one, live side by side down to the harvest which is the end. In spite of all efforts to correct and reform, the corruption of Christendom remains, nay, grows apace. To expel the vast crop of false doctrine, false professors, false teachers, is now as it has been for centuries an impossibility. Christ's solemn words hold down to the final consummation, "Let both grow together until the harvest." In such conditions a millennium of universal righteousness and knowledge of the Lord seems impossible until the separation takes place at the harvest.

(2) Parable of the Pounds (Lk 19 11-27).—Jesus was on His last journey to Jerus, and near the city. The multitude was eager, expectant. They supposed the Kingdom of God was immediately to appear. The parable was spoken to correct this mistake and to reveal certain vital features of it. "A certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." There is little difficulty in grasping the main teaching of this suggestive narrative. The nobleman is the Lord Jesus Christ Himself; the far country is heaven; the kingdom He goes to receive is the Messianic kingdom, for the victorious establishment of which all God's people long and pray. The servants are those who sustain responsible relation to the Lord because of the trust committed to them. The rebellious citizens are those who refuse subjection to His will and defy His authority. His return is His second coming. The parable spans the whole period between His ascension and His advent. It measures across our entire age. It tells of Christ's going away, it describes the conduct of His servants and of the citizens during His absence; it foretells His return and the reckoning that is to follow. Mark the words, "And it came to pass, when he was come back again, having received the kingdom." It is in heaven He receives the investiture of the kingdom (Rev 5 6). It is on earth that He administers it. The phrase, "having received the kingdom," cannot by any dexterity of exegesis be made to denote the end of time or the end of the Millennium, or of His receiving it at the end of the world; it is then He delivers it up to God, even the Father (1 Cor 15 24-28).

The order and sequence of events as traced by the Lord disclose the same fact made prominent in the parable of the Wheat and Tares, namely, that during the whole period between His ascension and His return there is no place for a Millennium of world-wide righteousness and prosperity. But Scripture warrants the belief that such blessedness is surely to fill the earth, and if so, it must be realized after Christ's second coming.

II. Teaching of the Apostles.—There is no unmistakable evidence that the apostles expected a thousand years of prosperity and

1. Expecta- tion of the Advent peace during Christ's absence in the heaven. In Acts 1 11 we read that the heavenly visitants said to the apostles, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye looking into heaven?" This attitude of the men of Galilee became the permanent attitude of the primitive church. It was that of the uplifted gaze. Paul's exultant words respecting the Thessalonians might well be applied to all believers of that ancient time, that they "turned unto God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven" (1 Thess 1 9.10). It is the prominent theme of the NT epp. In the NT it is mentioned 318 t. One verse in every thirty, we are told, is occupied with it. It is found shining with a glad hope in the first letters Paul wrote, those to the Thessalonians. It is found in the last he wrote, the second to Timothy, gleaming with the bright anticipation of the crown he was to receive at the Redeemer's appearing. James quickens the flagging courage, and reanimates the drooping spirits of believers with this trumpet peal: "Be ye also patient; establish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord is at hand" (5 8). Peter exhorts to all holy conversation and godliness by the like motive: "Looking for and hastening the coming of the day of God" (2 Pet 3 12 m). Amid the deepening gloom and the gathering storms of the last days, Jude (ver 14) cheers us with the words of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon . . . the ungodly." John closes the Canon with the majestic words, "Behold, he cometh with the clouds." "Behold, I come quickly." These men, speaking by the Spirit of the living God, know there can be no reign of universal righteousness, no deliverance of groaning creation, no redemption of the body, no binding of Satan, and no Millennium while the tares grow side by side with the wheat; while the ungodly world flings its defiant shout after the retiring nobleman, "We will not have this man to reign over us"; and while Satan, that strong, fierce spirit, loose in this age, deceives, leads captive, devours and ruins as he lists. Therefore the passionate longing and the assurance of nearing deliverance at the coming of Christ fill so large a place in the faith and the life of the primitive disciples.

In 1 Thess 4 17 Paul speaks of himself and others who may survive till the Lord's coming: "Then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air" (cf 1 Cor 15 51.52). This implies fairly that the apostle did not know that long ages would elapse between his own day and Christ's advent. There was to his mind the possibility of His coming in his lifetime; in fact, he seems to have an expectation that he would not pass through the gates of death at all, that he would live to see the Lord in His glorious return, for the day and the hour of the advent is absolutely concealed even from inspired men. The inference is perfectly legitimate that Paul and his fellow-disciples did not anticipate that a thousand years should intervene between them and the coming.

Furthermore, the Thessalonians had fallen into a serious mistake (2 Thess 2 1-12). By a false spirit, or by a forged ep. as from Paul, they were led to believe that "the day of the Lord is now present" (ERV), ver 2. The apostle sets them right about this solemn matter. He assures them that some things must precede that day, namely, "the falling away," or apostasy, and the appearing of a powerful adversary whom he calls "the Man of Sin," and describes as "the Son of Perdition." Neither the one nor the other of these two, the apostasy and the Man of Sin, was then present. But the road was fast getting ready for them. There was the "mystery of lawlessness" already at work at the time, and although a certain restraint held it in check, nevertheless when the check was removed it would at once precipitate the apostasy, and it would issue in the advent of the Man of Sin, and he should be brought to nought by the personal coming of Jesus Christ. This appears to be the import of the passage.

Here was the appropriate place to settle forever for these saints and for all others the question of a long period to intervene before the Saviour's advent. How easy and natural it would have been for Paul to write, "Brethren, there is to be first a time of universal blessedness for the world, the Millennium, and after that there will be an apostasy and the revelation of the Man of Sin whom Christ will destroy by the brightness of His coming." But Paul intimated nothing of the sort. Instead, he distinctly says that the mystery of lawlessness is already working, that it will issue in "the falling away," and then shall appear the great adversary, the Lawless One, who shall meet his doom by the advent of Christ. The mystery of lawlessness, however, is held in restraint, we are told. May it not be possible that the check shall be taken off, then the Millennium succeed, and after that the apostasy and the Son of Perdition? No, for its removal is immediately followed by the coming of the great foe, the Antichrist. For this foe has both an apocalypse and a parousia like Christ Himself. Hence, the lifting of the restraint is sudden, by no means a prolonged process.

The apostle speaks of the commencement, progress, and close of a certain period. It had commenced when he wrote. Its close is 4. No Room at the coming of Christ. What inter- for Millen- venes? The continuance of the evil nium secretly at work in the body of professing Christians, and its progress from the incipient state to the maturity of daring wickedness which will be exhibited in the Man of Sin. This condition of things fills up the whole period, if we accept Paul's teaching as that of inspired truth. There appears to be no place for a Millennium within the limits which the apostle here sets. The only escape from this conclusion, as it seems to us, is, to deny that the coming of Christ is His actual, personal second coming. But the two words, epipháneia and parousia, which elsewhere are used separately to denote His advent, are here employed to give "graphic vividness" and certainty to the event, and hence they peremptorily forbid a figurative interpretation. The conclusion seems unavoidable that there can be no Millennium on this side of the advent of Christ.

Our Lord's Olivet prophecy (Mt 24, 25; Mk 13; Lk 21) accords fully with the teaching of the apostles on the subject. In that dis-

5. Harmony of Christ and Apostles course He foretells wars, commotions among the nations, Jerusalem's capture and the destruction of the temple, Israel's exile, Christians persecuted while bearing their testimony throughout the world, cosmic convulsions, unparalleled tribulation and sufferings which terminate only with His advent. From the day this great prophecy was spoken down to the hour of His actual coming He offers no hope of a Millennium. He opens no place for a thousand years of blessedness for the earth.

These are some of the grounds on which Bib. students known as Premillennialists rest their belief touching the coming of the Lord and the Millennial reign.

MILLET, mil'et, mil'it (דִּבְדָּה, dōhan; κέγχρος, kégchros): One of the ingredients of the prophet's bread (Ezk 4 9). The Arab. equivalent is dukhn, the common millet, Panicum miliaceum, an annual grass 3 or 4 ft. high with a much-branched nodding panicle. Its seeds are as small as mustard seeds and are used largely for feeding small birds, but are sometimes ground to flour and mixed with other cereals for making bread. The Italian millet, setaria italica, known as Bengal grass, is also called in Arab. dukhn, and has a similar seed. A somewhat similar grain, much more widely cultivated as a summer crop, is the Indian millet—also called "Egyp maize"—the Sorghum annuum. This is known as dhurah in Arab., and the seed as dhurah beidd, "white dourra." It is a very important crop, as it, like the common millet, grows and matures without any rain. It is an important breadstuff among the poor.

Both the common millet and the dourra were cultivated in Egypt in very ancient times; the Heb dōhan was certainly the first, but may include all three varieties. E. W. G. MASTERMAN an earth embankment; in Jgs 9 6.20; 2 K 12 20, we get מִלּוֹא בֵּית, bēth millō, tr<sup>d</sup> in EV "House of Millo," which Winckler thinks may

1. OT have been the original Jebusite temple shrine of Jerus [see BETH-MILLO]; References LXX reads Βηθμααλόν, Bēthmaalōn, also Maalōn and oikos Maalōn: It is generally supposed that "The Millo" was some kind of fortress or other defence, but many speculations have been made regarding its position. In 2 S 5 9, we read that David built round about from the Millo and inward, or (in LXX) "he fortified it, the city, round about from the Millo and his house" (cf 1 Ch 11 8). In connection with Solomon's strengthening of the fortifications, there are several references to Millo. In 1 K 9 15, Solomon raised a levy "to build the house of Jeh, and his own house, and Millo, and the wall of Jerus," etc; in ver 24, "Pharaoh's daughter came up out of the city of David unto her house which Solomon had built for her: then did he build Millo"; in 1 K 11 27, Solomon "built Millo, and repaired the breach of the city of David his father." At a later time Hezekiah "took courage, and built up all the wall that was broken down, and raised it up to the towers, and the other wall without, and strengthened Millo in the city of David" (2 Ch 32 5; 2 K 12 20); Joash was slain by his servants "at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla," but possibly this may have been in Shechem (cf Jgs 9 6).

The mention of the site in the days of David and the reference to it in connection with the city of David (1 K 11 27) point to some 2. Identical part of the southeastern hill S. of the temple. It is suggestive that Millo Akra Site is in LXX always tr<sup>d</sup> by "Akra."

It seems to the present writer very probable that it was a fortress crowning the hill on which at a later time stood the Syrian Akra, which hill, if we are to believe Jos (BJ, V, iv, 1, etc), was cut down because its commanding situation dominated the temple. This hill cannot have been the site of Zion afterward known as "David's Burg" (City of David), because the tombs of the Judaean kings were within its walls, and that alone would have made the complete leveling of the site impossible, but whereas the Jebusite fortress was probably not far from Gihon, this fortified summit may have been, as Watson suggests for the Akra, as far north as where the present Al Akra mosque is situated. In David's time it may have been an isolated and detached fort guarding the north approach, but if it was originally a Jebusite high place (Winckler) partly of sun-dried brick like similar constructions in Babylonia, the account of its being leveled would be much more credible. The importance of this site in the days of Solomon is fully explicable if this was the citadel guarding the newly built temple and royal palaces.

Dr. G. A. Smith is inclined to think that Millo may have been a fortress "off the south end of Ophel, to retain and protect the old pool," and Vincent suggests that the site of Millo is that now occupied by the great causeway connecting the Western and Eastern hills along which runs the ṭariḳ bāb es silsileh. MINCING, min'sing (מִנְצָה, ṭāphaph): "Taking short steps," "walking trippingly." Only in Isa 3 16, "walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling [a jingling of the metal anklets] with their feet." Cf OHL.

MIND, mind (voûs, nous, διάνοια, diánoia, σύνεσις, sunesis): We look in vain in the OT and NT for anything like scientific precision in the

1. No Pre-employment of terms which are meant cision in the to indicate mental operations.

Terms Used In the OT lebbh is made to stand for the various manifestations of our intellectual and emotional nature. We are often misled by the different renderings in the different versions, both early and late.

Sometimes nepesh or "soul" is rendered by "mind" (Dt 18 6 AV, "desire of his soul" or "mind"); sometimes ruah or "spirit" (Gen 28 35, "grief of mind," ruah). Here Luther renders the term Herzeleid ("grief of heart"), and the Vulg. animum. Sometimes lebbh is used, as in Isa 46 8, "bring it to mind" (lit. "heart"), or in Ps 31 12, "I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind" (lit. "heart"), as in LXX, kardia, and in Vulg., a corde. Luther, im Herzen, new Dutch tr, uit de gedachtenis (i.e. "memory").

In the Apoc this precision is equally lacking. Thus we read in Wisd 9 15, "For the corruptible body [sōma] presseth down the soul [psuchē] and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind [nous] that museth upon many things." But these distinctions are alien to the letter and spirit of revelation, a product of the Gr and not of the Heb mind.

In the NT the words nous and dianoia are used, but not with any precision of meaning.

Here too several terms are rendered by the same word. Thus the Heb ruah is rendered by nous in 1 Cor 2 16 ("mind of the Lord," with reference to Isa 40 13, where "ruah YHWH [Jehi]" occurs). Nous evidently means here the organ of spiritual perception—a word borrowed from the LXX, where it is sometimes made to stand for lebbh (Job 7 17; Isa 41 22); sometimes for ruah (Isa 40 13). In Lk 24 45—the solitary text, where nous occurs in the Gospels—it is rendered "understanding" in AV, "mind" in RV.

For a true solution we must turn to the Epp. of Paul, where the word frequently occurs in an ethical sense—sometimes in connection with

2. Ethical Sense (sinful) flesh as in Col 2 18, "puffed up by his fleshly mind," sometimes in direct contrast to it, as in Rom 7 25, "with my mind I serve the law of God; with the flesh the law of sin." In Tit 1 15 it is brought into parallelism with conscience ("Their mind and their conscience are defiled"). Phrases like "a reprobate mind," "corrupted in mind" occur elsewhere (Rom 1 28; 1 Tim 6 5). From this state of "reprobation" and "corruption" man must be saved. Hence the necessity of complete transformation and renewal of the inner man (Rom 12 2), "transformed by the renewing of your mind [nous]."

Another word, with possibly a deeper meaning, is sometimes employed, viz. dianoia, which lit. means "meditation," "reflection." It is found

3. *Dianoia as synonymous with nous in a good and Nous sense, as e.g. in 1 Jn 5 20 (He "hath given us an understanding, that we know him that is true"). Evidently the sense here is the same as in Rom 12 2, a renovated mind capable of knowing Christ. It may also bear a bad sense, as in Eph 4 18, where the Gentiles are represented as having "a darkened understanding," or in parallelism with sārx: "the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph 2 3), and with nous: "walking in vanity of mind [nous] and a darkened understanding [dianoia]" in Eph 4 18. At times also "heart" and "mind" are joined to indicate human depravity (Lk 1 51: "He hath scattered the proud in the imagination [dianoia] of their heart"). It is interesting also to know that the Great Commandment is rendered in Mt 22 37—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul [psuchē], and with all thy understanding [dianoia]" [EV "mind"]—though Mk has two renderings in one of which dianoia occurs, and in the other sunesis (Mk 12 30.33), though possibly without any psychological refinement of meaning, for the term sunesis occurs elsewhere in conjunction with pneumatikós ("spiritual understanding," Col 1 9). It also stands alone in the sense of an "understanding enlightened from above" (2 Tim 2 7 AV: "The Lord give thee understanding [sunesis] in all things"). The history of these terms is interesting, but not of great theological significance.

It seems to us that Godet's interpretation of the Great Commandment in Lk 10 27 is somewhat far-fetched.

4. The Great Commandment He considers the heart as "the central focus from which all rays of the moral life go forth, and that in their three principal directions: the powers of feeling, or the affections, nepesh ('soul') in the sense of feeling; the active powers, the impulsive aspirations, the might ('with all thy might'), the will; and in the intellectual powers, analytical or contemplative, dianoia ('with all thy mind'). The difference between the heart, which reaches the trunk and the three branches, feeling, will, understanding, is emphatically marked in the Alexandrian variation, by the substitution of the preposition en ('in') for ek ('with,' 'from') in the three last members. Moral life proceeds from the heart and manifests itself without, in the three forms of activity. The impulse God-ward proceeds from the heart, and is realized in the life through the will, which consecrates itself actively to the accomplishment of His will; and through the mind, which pursues the track of His thought in all His works" (Godet, Comm. on the Gospel of Lk, II, 38, 39).

MINE, mīn, MINING, mīn'ing: In Job 28 1-11 we have the only Bib. reference to mines. The writer very likely derived his information either from personal observation or from a description by an eyewitness, of the mining operations of Sinai (see METALS). No traces of ancient mines have yet been found in Pal and Syria. What metals were taken out came from the superficial strata. The mines of Upper Egypt have already been mentioned. Burton and other travelers in Northern Arabia and the Red Sea country have found there evidences of ancient mining operations.

The usual Egypt method of mining was to follow the vein from the surface as far as it was practicable with tools corresponding to our pick and hoe, hammer and chisel. The shafts frequently extended into the ground a distance of 180 to 200 ft. The rock when too hard to be dug out was first cracked by having fires built on it. The metal-bearing stone was carried in baskets to the surface, where the crushing and separating took place. The mining operations were performed by an army of slaves who were kept at their work day and night, driven with the lash until they died, when their places were taken by others. See METALS; CRAFTS, II, 10.

MINERALS, min'ēr-ālz. See METALS; STONES, PRECIOUS.

MINGLED PEOPLE, min'g'ld pē'p'l (MIXED MULTITUDE):

(1) "Mixed multitude" occurs in Nu 11 4 as a tr of אֲרָבָה, arabah, "collection," "rabble." The same phrase in Ex 12 38; Neh 13 3 is the rendition of אֲרָבָה, arabah. "Mingled people" is used also to translate erebh, and is found in Jer 25 20.24; 50 37; Ezk 30 5, and in 1 K 10 15 RV (AV "Arabia"; cf ARVm). In the last case both revised VSS have followed the pointing of the MT, and this pointing alone distinguishes "mingled people" (erebh) from "Arabia" (arābh); in the unpointed text both words are equally אֲרָבָה. Now "the traffic of the merchants, and of all the kings of the mingled people, and of the governors of the country" is very awkward, and the correction into "Arabia," as in the MT (and EV) of the || 2 Ch 9 14, is indicated. Probably the same change should be made in Ezk 30 5, reading "Ethiopia, and Put, and Lud, and Arabia, and Cub." A similar textual confusion seems to be responsible for either "and all the kings of Arabia" or "and all the kings of the mingled people" in Jer 25 24. On all these verses see the comms.

(2) In Jer 25 20; 50 37, "mingled people" is a term of contempt for the hybrid blood of certain of Israel's enemies. Something of this same contempt may be contained in Ex 12 38, where a multitude of non-Israelitish camp-followers are mentioned as accompanying the children of Israel in the exodus, and in Nu 11 4 it is this motley body that seduced Israel to sin. But who they were, why they wished or were permitted to join in the exodus, and what eventually became of them or of their descendants is a very perplexing puzzle. In Neh 13 3, the "mixed multitude" consists of the inhabitants of Pal whom the Jews found there after the return from the exile (see SAMARIA). In accord with the command of Dt 23 3-5, the Jews withdrew from all religious intercourse whatever had been established with these.

NOTE.—The Heb noun for "mingled people" may or may not be connected with the vb. trd "mingle" in Ezr 9 2; Ps 106 35; Dnl 2 43. On this see the lexicons.

MINIAMIN, min'ya-min, mi-ni'a-min (מִינְיָאִמִּין, minyāmīn):

(1) A Levite who assisted Kore, the son of Imnah, in the distribution of the freewill offerings (2 Ch 31 15).

(2) A priestly family of the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12 17), probably = MIJAMIN (2).

(3) A priestly participant in the ceremony of the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 41).

MINISH, min'ish (AV and ERV Ex 5 19; Ps 107 39; ERV Isa 19 6; Hos 8 10): The vb. "minish," "make small," is now obsolete, being replaced by its derivative "diminish" (cf ARV in all vs above).

1. The Word "Ministry."—The common NT term for the ministry is diakonia (διακονία), and along with it we find diakonos (διάκονος), "minister," ho diakonōn (ὁ διακονῶν), "he who ministers," and diakonein (διακονεῖν), "to minister." All these words have a very extensive application within the NT and are by no means restricted to denote service within the Christian church; even when so restricted the words are used in a great variety of meanings: e.g. (1) discipleship in general (Jn 12 26); (2) service rendered to the church because of the "gifts" bestowed (Rom 12 7; 1 Cor 12 5), and hence all kinds of service (Acts 6 2; Mt 20 26); (3) specifically the "ministry of the Word" (Eph 4 12), and most frequently the "apostleship" (Acts 1 17; 20 24; 21 19; Rom 11 13, etc); (4) such services as feeding the poor (Acts 6 1; 11 29; 12 25), or organizing and providing the great collection for the poor saints at Jerus (Rom 15 25; 2 Cor 8 4.19, etc); (5) such services as those rendered by Stephanas (1 Cor 16 15), by Archippus (Col 4 17), by Tychicus (Eph 6 21; Col 4 7), etc.

In this art. the word has to do with the guidance and government of a united community, fellowship, or brotherhood of men and women whose inward bond of union was the sense of fellowship with Jesus their Risen Lord. In all ages of Christianity the call to become the follower of Jesus, while it is the deepest of all personal things and comes to each one singly, never comes solitarily. The devout soul must share his experiences with those like-minded, and the fellowship thus formed must be able to take outward shape, which cannot fail to render necessary some sort of rule and guidance. The very thought of the church with articulate expression of a common faith, administration of the sacraments, meetings and their right conduct, aid given to the spiritual and bodily needs of their fellow-members, implies a ministry or executive of some kind. To endeavor to explain what was the character of the ministry of the Christian church in the earliest centuries of its existence and how it came into being is the aim of this article.

II. Two Different Kinds of Ministry.—The earliest fact we have about the organization of the Christian church is given in Acts 6, where we are told that "seven" men were appointed to what is called a "ministry of tables" (diakonein trapezais), which is distinguished from the "ministry of the word" (diakonia tou logou). This distinction between two different kinds of "ministry" which appears at the very beginning is seen to exist all through the apostolic church and beyond it into the sub-apostolic. It can be traced in the Epp. of St. Paul and in other parts of the NT. It is seen in the Didache, in the Pastor of Hermas, in the Epp. of Barnabas, in the Apology of Justin Martyr, in the writings of Irenaeus and elsewhere. (For a full list of authorities, cf Harnack, Texte u. Untersuchungen, II, ii, 111 ff.) The one ministry differs from the other in function, and the distinction depends on a conception to be afterward examined—that of "gifts." The common name, in apostolic and sub-apostolic literature, for the members of the one kind of ministry is "those who speak the Word of God" (lalountes ton logon tou Theou). Modern writers have called it the charismatic, but perhaps the better term is the prophetic ministry; while to the other class belong all the names which are given to denote office-bearers in the local churches. The two existed side by side. The great practical distinction between them was that the members of the former were in no sense office-bearers in any one Christian community; they were not elected or appointed to any office; they were not set apart for duties by any ecclesiastical ceremony. The "Word" came to them and they were compelled by inward impulsion to speak the message given them to deliver. Some were wanderers; others confined themselves to their own community. They were responsible to no ecclesiastical authority. Churches were encouraged to test them and their message; for the "gift" of discerning whether a so-called prophet spoke a truly Divine message was always presupposed to be within the local church. But once accepted they took a higher place than the office-bearers, they presided at the Lord's Supper, and their judgment in cases of discipline could overbear ordinary ecclesiastical rules. The contest of Cyprian with the "confessors" at Carthage was the last stage of the long struggle which arose in the 2d cent. between the two ministries. Out of the other kind of ministry came, by ordinary development, all the various kinds of ecclesiastical organization which now exist. Its members were office-bearers in the strictest sense of the word; they were selected to do ecclesiastical work in a given community, they were set apart for it in a special way, and they were responsible to the church for its due performance.

But it is important to remember that while the two kinds of ministries are thoroughly distinct from each other, the same individuals might belong to both kinds. The "prophetic gift" might fall on anyone, private member or office-bearer alike. Office-holding did not prevent the "gift." Polycarp, office-bearer at Smyrna, was a prophet; so was Ignatius of Antioch, and many others. The "gift" of speaking the Word of God was a personal and not an official source of enlightenment.

In the prophetic ministry we find a threefold division—apostles, prophets and teachers. Some

1. The Prophetic Ministry would add a fourth, evangelists, i.e. men like the apostles in all respects save in having seen the Lord in the flesh. The distinction may hold good for the apostolic period, though that appears to be very doubtful; it disappears utterly in the sub-apostolic; evangelist and apostle seem to be one class. This triple division may be traced through early Christian literature from 1 Cor down to the Clementine Homilies, which can scarcely be earlier than 200 AD. It is hardly possible to define each class in any mechanical fashion; speaking generally, the first were the missionary pioneers whose message was chiefly to the unconverted, while to the second and third classes belonged exhortation and instruction within the Christian communities.

(1) Apostles.—In the NT and in the other lit. of the early church the word "apostle" is used in a narrower and in a wider sense, and it is the more extensive use of the word which denotes the first division of the prophetic ministry. The Lord selected the Twelve, "whom also he named apostles" (Mk 3 14, RVm), to be trained by personal fellowship with Him and by apprentice mission work among the villages of Galilee for that proclamation of His gospel which was to be their future life-work. Two things strictly personal and excluding every thought of successors separated the "Eleven" from all other men: long personal fellowship with Jesus in the inner circle of His followers, and their selection by Himself while still in the flesh. They were the "Apostles" in the narrow sense of the word. But the name was given to many others. Matthias, who had enjoyed personal intercourse with Jesus both before and after the resurrection, was called by the disciple company, confirmed by decision of the lot, to the same 'service and sending forth' (diakonia kai apostolē) (Acts 1 25). Paul was called by the Lord Himself, but in vision and inward experience, and took rank with those before mentioned (Rom 1 1 ff; Gal 2 7-9). Others, called apostles, are mentioned by name in the NT. Barnabas is not only an apostle but is recognized to have rank equal to the "Eleven" (Acts 14 14; Gal 2 7-9). The correct rendering of the text (Rom 16 7) declares that Andronicus and Junias were apostles who had known Christ before Paul became a believer. Chrysostom, who thinks that Junias or Junia was a woman, does not believe that her sex hindered her from being an apostle. Silas or Silvanus and Timothy, on the most natural interpretation of the passage, are called apostles by St. Paul in 1 Thess 1 1.6. The title can hardly be denied to Apollos (1 Cor 4 6.9). St. Paul praises men, whom he calls "the apostles of the churches," and declares them to be "the glory of Christ" (2 Cor 8 23 m). One of them, Epaphroditus, is mentioned by name—"your apostle," says Paul writing to the Christians of Philippi (Phil 2 25 m); and there must have been many others.

"Apostles" are distinguished from the "Twelve" by St. Paul in the rapid summary he gives of the appearances of Jesus after the resurrection (1 Cor 15 5.7). Besides those true apostles the NT mentions others who are called "false apostles" (2 Cor 11 13), and the church of Ephesus is praised for using its "gift" of discrimination to reject men who "call themselves apostles, and they are not" (Rev 2 2). This wider use of the word has descended to the present day; "apostles" or "holy apostles" is still the name for missionaries and missioners in some parts of the Greek church. The double use of the word to denote the "Twelve" or the "Eleven" is seen in the sub-apostolic age in the Didache, which recognizes the narrower use of the word in its title ("The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles"), and in the text portrays the itinerant missionaries to whom the name in its widest use belonged.

Those "apostles," to whatever class they belonged, had one distinguishing characteristic: they had chosen as their life-work to be the missionary pioneers of the gospel of the Kingdom of Christ. They were all engaged in aggressive work, and were distinguished from others not so much by what they were as by what they did. They were wanderers with no fixed place of residence. The requirements of their work might make them abide for long periods in some center (as did Paul at Corinth and at Ephesus, or some of the "Eleven" at Jerus), but they had no permanent home life. As the earlier decades passed, their numbers increased rather than diminished. They are brought vividly before us in such writings as the Dulache. They were to be highly honored, but as severely tested. They were not expected to remain longer than three days within a Christian community, nor to fare softly when there (Dul., ii.4-6). The vindication of their call was what they were able to accomplish, and to this St. Paul, the greatest of them, appeals over and over again.

(2) Prophets.—Prophets had been the religious guides of Israel of old, and the spirit of prophecy had never entirely died out. John the Baptist (Mt 11 9), Simeon (Lk 2 25.26), and Anna (Lk 2 36) had the gift in the days of Christ. It was natural for the Sam woman to believe that the stranger who spoke to her by the well was a prophet (Jn 4 19). The reappearance of prophecy in its old strength was looked on as a sign of the nearness of the coming of the Messiah. Jesus Himself had promised to send prophets among His followers (Mt 10 41; 23 34; Lk 11 49). The promise was fulfilled. Christian prophets appeared within the church from its beginning. Nor were they confined to communities of Jewish Christians; prophecy appeared spontaneously wherever Christianity spread. We are told of prophets in the churches of Jerus and Caesarea where the membership was almost purely Jewish; at Antioch where Jews and Gentiles united to make one congregation; and everywhere throughout the gentile churches—in Rome, Corinth, Thessalonica and in the Galatian churches (Acts 11 27; 15 32; 21 9.10; Rom 12 6.7; 1 Cor 14 32.36.37; 1 Thess 5 20; Gal 3 3-5). Prophets are mentioned by name—Agabus (Acts 11 28; 21 10), Symeon and others at Antioch (Acts 13 1), Judas and Silas in Jerus (Acts 15 32). Nor was the "gift" confined to men; women prophesied—the four daughters of Philip among others (Acts 21 9). From the earliest times down to the close of the 2d cent. and later, an uninterrupted stream of prophets and prophetesses appeared in the Christian churches. The statements of NT writers, and esp. of St. Paul, imply that prophets abounded in the earliest churches. St. Paul, for example, expected the prophetic gift to appear in every Christian community. He recognized that they had a regular place in the meeting for public worship (1 Cor 14); he desired that every member in the Corinthian church should possess the "gift" and cultivate it (1 Cor 14 1.5. 39); he exhorted the brethren at Thessalonica to 'cherish prophesyings' (1 Thess 5 20), and those in Rome to make full use of prophecy (Rom 12 6). If he criticized somewhat severely the conduct of the "prophets" in the Corinthian church, it was to teach them how to make full use of their "gift" for the right edifying of the brethren.

Prophecy was founded on revelation; the prophets were men esp. "gifted" with spiritual intuition and magnetic speech. Sometimes their "gift" took the form of ecstasy, but by no means always; St. Paul implies that prophets have a real command of and can control their utterances. Sometimes their message came to them in visions, such as we find in the Apocalypse and in Hermas; but this was not a necessary means. The prophets spoke as they were moved, and the Spirit worked on them in various ways.

The influence of those prophets seems to have increased rather than diminished during the earlier decades of the 2d cent. While the duty of the apostle was to the unbelievers, Jewish or heathen, the sphere of the activity of the prophet was within the Christian congregation. It was his business to edify the brethren. Prophets had a recognized place in the meeting for the public worship of the congregation; if one happened to be present at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper, he presided to the exclusion of the office-bearers, and his prayers were expected to be extempore (Did., x.7); he had special powers when matters of discipline were discussed, as is plain from a great variety of evidence from Hermas down to Tertullian. From St. Paul's statements it seems that the largest number of the prophets he speaks of were members of the communities within which they used their "gift" of prophecy; but many of the more eminent prophets traveled from community to community edifying each. When such wandering prophets, with their wives and families, dwelt for a time in any Christian society, preaching and exhorting, it was deemed to be the duty of that society to support them, and regulations were made for such support. According to the Didache (ch xiii): "Every true prophet who shall settle among you is worthy of his support. . . . Every first-fruit then of the products of the winepress and threshing-floor, of oxen and of sheep, thou shalt take and give to the prophets. . . . In like manner also when thou openest a jar of wine or oil, take the first of it and give it to the prophets; and of money and clothing and every possession take the first as may seem right to thee, and give according to the commandment." Only, the receivers were to be true prophets. Each congregation had to exercise the "gift" of discrimination and sift the true from the false; for "false" prophets confronted the true in early Christianity as well as in the old Judaism.

(3) Teachers.—While the third class of the prophetic ministry, the teachers, is found joined to the other two both in the NT and in sub-apostolic lit., and while St. Paul assigns a definite place for their services in the meeting for edification (1 Cor 14 26), we hear less about them and their work. They seem, however, to have lingered much longer in active service in the early church than did the apostles and the prophets.

As has been said, the first notice we have of organization within a local church is in Acts 6, where at the suggestion of the apostles seven men were selected to administer the charity of the congregation.

2. The Local Ministry

The conception that "the Seven" were a special order of office-bearers, deacons, is a comparatively late suggestion. These men are nowhere called deacons; the official designation is "The Seven." It may be that the appointment of those men was only a temporary expedient, but it is more probable that "the Seven" of Acts 6 are the elders of Acts 11; for we find those "elders" performing the duties which "the Seven" were appointed to fulfil. If so, we have in Acts 6 the narrative of the beginnings of local organization as a whole. When we turn to the expansion of Christian communities outside Jerus, we have no such distinct picture of beginnings; but as all the churches in Pal evidently regarded the society in Jerus as the mother church, it is likely that their organization was the same. Acts tells us that Paul and Barnabas left behind them at Derbe, Lystra and Iconium societies of brethren with "elders" at their head. The word used suggests an election by popular vote and was probably the same as had been used in the selection of the "Seven" men.

When we examine the records of the distinctively Pauline churches, there is not much direct evidence for the origins of the ministry there, but a great deal about the existence of some kind of rule and rulers. For one thing, we can see that these churches had and were encouraged to have feelings of independence and of self-government; a great deal is said about the possession of "gifts" which imply the presence and power of the Spirit of Jesus within the community itself. We find names applied to men who, if not actually office-bearers, are at least leaders and perform the functions of office-bearers—proistámenoi, poimēnes, episkopoi, diákonoi—and where special designations are lacking a distinction is always drawn between those who obey and those who are to be obeyed. In all cases those leaders or ministers are mentioned in the plural.

It may be said generally that about the close of the 1st cent. every Christian community was ruled by a body of men who are sometimes called presbyters (elders), sometimes but more rarely bishops (overseers), and whom modern church historians are inclined to call presbyter-bishops. Associated with them, but whether members of the same court or forming a court of their own it is impossible to say, were a number of assistant rulers called deacons. See BISHOP; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; DEACON; ELDER. The court of elders had no president or permanent chairman. There was a twofold not a threefold ministry. During the 3d cent., rising into notice by way of geographical distribution rather than in definite chronological order, this twofold congregational ministry became threefold in the sense that one man was placed at the head of each community with the title of pastor or bishop (the titles are interchangeable as late as the 4th cent. at least). In the early centuries those local churches, thus organized, while they never lacked the sense that they all belonged to one body, were independent self-governing communities preserving relations to each other, not by any political organization embracing them all, but by fraternal fellowship through visits of deputies, interchange of letters, and in some indefinite way giving and receiving assistance in the selection and setting apart of pastors.

Origins of local ministry.—The question arises, How did this organization come into being? We may dismiss, to begin with, the idea once generally accepted among the Reformed churches, that the Christian society simply took over and made use of the synagogue system of organization (Vitringa, De synagoga vetere). The points common to both reveal a superficial resemblance, but no more. The distinctive differences are great. When we add to them the decisive statement of Epiphanius (Haeresis, xxx.18), that the Jewish Christians (Judaizing) organized their communities with archons and an archisynagogos like the Jewish synagogues of the Dispersion and unlike the Christian churches, all the evidence makes it impossible to believe that the earliest Christian organization was simply taken over from the Jewish. On the other hand, there is little evidence that the apostles (the Twelve and St. Paul) received a special commission from Our Lord, to appoint and ordain the office-bearers of the earliest Christian communities, so exclusive that there could be no legitimate organization without this apostolic authority and background. We find, on the contrary, the church in Rome exercising all the disciplinary functions of a congregation without this apostolic ecclesiastical rule supposed to be essential. Even in the mother-church in Jerus, the congregational meeting exercised rule over the apostles themselves, for we find apostles summoned before it and examined on their conduct (Acts 11 1-4). The whole question demands the recognition of several facts:

(1) Evidence abounds to show that the local churches during the apostolic and sub-apostolic age were self-governing communities and that the real background of the ministry was not apostolic authority but the congregational meeting. Its representative character and its authority are seen in the apostolic and sub-apostolic lit. from St. Paul to Cyprian.

(2) The uniquely Christian correlation of the three conceptions of leadership, service and "gifts"; leadership depended on service, and service was possible by the possession and recognition of special "gifts" which were the evidence of the presence and power of the Spirit of Jesus within the community. These "gifts" gave the church a Divine authority to exercise rule and oversight apart from any special apostolic direction.

(3) The general evidence existing to show that there was a gradual growth of the principle of association from looser to more compact forms of organization (Gayford, art. "Church" in HDB; also Harnack, Expos, 1887, January to June, 322-24), must not be forgotten; only one must remember that in young communities the growth is rapid.

(4) We must also bear in mind that the first Christians were well acquainted with various kinds of social organization which entered into their daily life and which could not fail to suggest how they might organize their new societies.

Examples occur readily: (a) Every Jewish village community was ruled by its "seven wise men," and it is probable that the appointment of the "Seven" in the primitive Jewish church was suggested by familiarity with this example of social polity. (b) It was and is an almost universal oriental usage that the "next of kin" to the founder was recognized, after the founder's death, to be the head of the new religious community founded, and this usage accounts for the selection of James, the eldest male surviving relative of Our Lord, to be the recognized and honored head of the church in Jerus. James has been called the first bishop; but when we read in Eusebius (HE, III, 11, 1, 2; 32, 4; IV, 22, 4; III, 20, 1-8) how his successors were chosen, the term seems inappropriate. A succession in the male line of the kindred of Jesus, where the selection to office is mainly in the hands of a family council, and where two (James and Zoker) can rule together, has small analogy to episcopal rule. (c) The relation of "patron" to "client," which in one form or other had spread throughout the civilized world, is suggested by a series of kindred words used to denote rulers in local churches. We find proistámenoi (προϊστάμενοι), proistátis (προϊστάτης), proestós (προεστώς), in various writers, and the last was used as late as the middle of the 2d cent. to denote ministry in the Rom church (Rom 12 8; 16 2; 1 Thess 5 12; Hermas, Pastor, Vis. 2, 4; Justin, Apol. i. 65). (d) The Rom empire was honeycombed with "gilds," some recognized by law, most of them without legal recognition and liable to suppression. These confraternities were of very varied character—trades unions, burial clubs, etc., but a large proportion were for the purpose of practising special religious rites. The Jewish synagogues of the Dispersion seemed to have been enrolled among those confraternities, and certainly appeared to their heathen neighbors to be one kind of such private associations for the practice of a religion which had been legalized. Many scholars have insisted that the gentile Christian churches simply copied the organization of such confraternities (Renan, Les Apôtres; Heinrici, Zeitschrift f. wissenschaftl. Theol., 1876-77); Hatch, Organization of the Early Christian Churches. There must have been some external resemblances. Pliny believed that the Christian churches of Bithynia were illicit confraternities (Ep. 96; cf. Lucian, Peregrinus Proteus). They had, in common with the churches, a democratic constitution; they shared a "common meal" at stated times; they made a monthly collection; they were ruled by a committee of office-bearers; and they exercised a certain amount of discipline over their members. Multitudes of Christians must have been members of such confraternities, and many continued to be so after accepting Christianity (Cyprian, Ep., lxvii. 6).

But while the Christian churches may have learned much about the general principles of associated life from all those varied forms of social organization, it cannot be said that they copied any one of them. The primitive Christian societies organized themselves independently in virtue of the new moral and social life implanted within them; and though they may have come to it by various paths, they all in the end arrived at one common form—a society ruled by a body of office-bearers who possessed the "gifts" of government and of subordinate service embodied in the offices of presbyter and deacon.

III. The Threefold Congregational Ministry.—During the 2d cent. the ministry was subject to a change. The ruling body of office-bearers in every congregation received a permanent president, who was called the pastor or bishop, the latter term being the commoner. The change came gradually. It provoked no strong opposition. By the beginning of the 3d cent. it was everywhere accepted.

When we seek to trace the causes why the college of elders received a president, who became the center of all the ecclesiastical life in the local church and the one potent office-bearer, we are reduced to conjecture. This only can be said with confidence, that the change began in the East and gradually spread to the West, and that there are hints of a gradual evolution (Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, 180, 183-85). Scholars have brought forward many reasons for the change; the need for an undivided leadership in times of danger from external persecution or from the introduction of gnostic speculations which disturbed the faith of the members; the convenience of being represented to other local churches by one man who could charge himself with the administration of the external affairs of the congregation; the need of one man to preside at the solemn and crowning act of worship, the administration of the Lord's Supper; the sense of congregational unity implied in the possession of one leader—each or all are probable ways in which the churches were influenced in making this change in their ministry.

This threefold congregational ministry is best seen in the Epp. of Ignatius of Antioch. They portray a Christian community having at its head a bishop, a presbyterium or session of elders, and a body of deacons. These form the ministry or office-bearers of the congregation to whom obedience is due. Nothing is to be done without the consent of the bishop, neither love-feast, nor sacrament, nor anything congregational. The ruling body is a court where the bishop sits as chairman surrounded by his council or session of elders; and the one is helpless without the other, for if the bishop be the lyre, the elders are the chords, and both are needed to produce melody. Ignatius compares the bishop to Jesus, and the elders to the apostles who surrounded Him. There is no trace of sacerdotalism, apostolic succession, one-man government, diocesan rule in those letters of Ignatius; and what they portray is unlike any form of diocesan episcopacy.

It is interesting to remark how all throughout the 3d cent. and later every body of Christians, even if consisting of fewer than twelve families, is instructed to organize itself into a church under a ministry of office-bearers, consisting of a bishop or pastor, at least two elders and at least three deacons. Should the bishop be illiterate—for character more than erudition determined his choice—the congregation was told to elect a reader, and provision was made for a ministry of women. It was possible to obey such instructions, because the ministry of the early church received no stipends. The ministry were office-bearers, to whom ecclesiastical obedience was due in virtue of their call and election and their being set apart by prayer, and perhaps by laying on of hands, for sacred office; but they were at the same time merchants, artisans, or engaged in other secular callings, and supported themselves. Buildings, set apart for public worship, did not exist until the very close of the 2d cent., and then only in a few populous centers in towns which had felt persecution but slightly. The only property which a church possessed, besides its copies of the Scriptures, its congregational records and perhaps a place of burial, were the offerings which were presented by members of the congregation, mostly in kind, after the Eucharist; and these offerings were distributed to the poor of the congregation. If office-bearers received a share, it was only on account of their poverty and because they were on the roll of widows, orphans and helpless poor.

This threefold congregational ministry has been called by some scholars "monarchical episcopacy," a title as high-sounding as it is misleading. The kingdom over which those so-called monarchs presided might and often did consist of less than twelve families, and their rule was fenced in with many restrictions. We can collect from the Epp. of Ignatius what were the powers and what the limitations (Epp. to Polycarp) of the bishop. He administered the finances of the church; he was president of the court of Elders; he had the right to call and presumably to preside over the court of discipline; and he had the regulation of the sacraments in his hands. On the other hand, it is very doubtful whether he, or even he in conjunction with the elders, could excommunicate; that appears to have remained in the hands of the congregational meeting. The bishop might convoke the congregational meeting for the purpose, but it belonged to the meeting and not to the bishop to appoint delegates and messengers to other churches; and the meeting had the power to order the bishop to go on such a mission.

(1) Aid given in selecting a bishop.—From what has been said it is plain that the selection of a bishop became one of the most important acts a congregation was called upon to perform. Accordingly, provision was made for its assistance. It is declared in the Apostolic Canons that if a congregation contains fewer than twelve men competent to vote at the election of a bishop, neighboring, "well-established" churches are to be written to in order that three men may be sent to assist the congregation in selecting their pastor (Sources of the Apostolic Canons, 7, 8). This is evidently the origin of what afterward became the custom and later a law, that the consecration of a bishop required the presence of three neighboring bishops—a rule which has given occasion to the saying that "all Christendom becomes Presbyterian on a consecration day." This custom and rule, which in its beginnings was simply practical assistance given to a weak by stronger congregations, came to bear the meaning that the bishop thus consecrated was an office-bearer in the church universal as well as the pastor of a particular congregation. It is also more than probable that this practice of seeking assistance in an emergency is the germ out of which grew the Synod—the earliest recorded synods being congregational meetings assisted in times of difficulty by advice of experienced persons from other churches.

(2) Bishops and presbyters.—When a small group of villagers had been won to Christianity through the efforts of the Christian congregation in a neighboring town, they commonly were disinclined to separate from it, and came from their villages into town to join in the public worship. "On the day called Sunday," says Justin Martyr, "all who live in the city and in the country gather together into one place" (Ap., i.67). The earliest collections of canons show that the bishop was able in time of absence or sickness to delegate his duties to elders or even to deacons; and this enabled him, when occasion for it arose, to be, through his office-bearers, the pastor of several congregations. We can see the same process at work more clearly in large towns where the number of Christians had become very large. The bishop was always held to be the head of the Christian community, however large, in one place. He was the pastor; he baptized; he presided at the Holy Supper; he admitted catechumens to the full communion of the brotherhood. By the middle of the 3d cent. the work in most large towns was more than one man could do. No record exists of the number of members belonging to the Rom church at this time, but some idea of its size may be obtained from the fact that it had more than 1,500 persons on its poor-roll; and before the close of the century the Rom Christians worshipped in over 40 separate places of meeting. It is obvious that one man could not perform the whole pastoral duties for such a multitude, and that most of the pastoral work must have been delegated to the elders or presbyters. The unity of the pastorate was for long strictly preserved by the custom that the bishop consecrated the communion elements in one church, and these were carried round to the other congregations. The bishop was thus the pastor in every congregation; the elders and deacons belonged to the whole Christian community; they served all the congregations and were not attached to one distinctively. In Alexandria, on the other hand, something like a parochial system gathered round the bishop, for individual presbyters were set over the separate congregations within the city. But always and without exception the original pastoral status of the bishop was preserved by the fact that one portion of the pastoral duties was invariably left in his hands—the rite of confirmation whereby catechumens were admitted to full communion.

The middle of the 3d cent. witnessed two changes in the ministry of the church. One was a multiplication of orders and the other the growth of a hierarchy; and while many causes went to produce these changes it can hardly be doubted that they were at least partly due to the imitation of pagan religious organization. Although we find the distinction between those who are to be obeyed and those who are to obey clearly laid down in the Epp. of St. Paul, we do not find a common term in general use to denote the former class until the beginning of the 3d cent. In the west the word was ordo, and in the east clerus, from which come our "orders" and "clergy." Ordo was the designation for the municipality in towns or for the committee which presided over a confraternity; and clerus denoted rank or class. The introduction of ministerial stipends and the implication that a paid ministry was expected to give its whole time to the service of the church made the distinction between clergy and laity more emphatic. When we investigate the matter, it is evident that the fact that the clergy are paid complicates the question; for the earliest lists are evidently those who are entitled to share in the funds of the church, and widows and orphans figure as members of the ordo or clerus. Setting this disturbing element aside we find that the earliest division of the ministry in the 3d cent. is into bishops, presbyters and deacons (all congregational); but bishops and presbyters are sometimes said to form the special ordo ecclesiasticus. The earliest addition to those three orders is the reader, and there follows soon the sub-deacon. Then come such persons as exorcists, acolyths, singers, door-keepers and even grave-diggers; and to such the name "minor orders" is given. All are included within the clergy, all receive a proportionate share of the revenues of the congregational funds. The presence of bishops, presbyters and deacons needs no explanation. Readers, as we have seen, were needed at first to assist illiterate bishops or pastors; their retention and the insertion of exorcists have been plausibly accounted for by the idea that they represented the absorption of the old prophetic ministry. But in instituting the other minor orders the Christian church evidently copied the pagan temple usages where persons who performed corresponding services were included among the temple ministry and had due share of the temple revenues. In the institution of a graded hierarchy including metropolitans and patriarchs, the churches probably followed the example of the great pagan organization called forth by the imperial cult of the Divi and Divae (Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry, 335 ff.). As Mommensen remarks, "The conquering Christian church took its hierarchic weapons from the arsenal of the enemy."

IV. Synods.—Synods to begin with were essentially democratic assemblies. They were, in their primitive form, congregational meetings assisted in times of emergency by delegates (not necessarily bishops) from "well-established churches," and they grew to be the instrument by which churches grouped round one center became united into one compact organization. The times were not democratic, and gradually the presence of the laity and even of presbyters and deacons and their combined assent to the decisions of the assembly became more and more a matter of form and gradually ceased altogether. The synods consisted exclusively of bishops and became councils for registering their decisions; and this implied that each local church was fully and completely represented by its pastor or bishop, who had become very much of an autocrat, responsible, not to his congregation nor even to a synod, but to God alone. Before the end of the 3d cent. and onward, synods or councils had become a regular part of the organization of the whole church, and the membership was confined to the bishops of the several churches included within the group. It was natural that such assemblies should meet in the provincial capitals, for the roads converged to the cities which were the seats of the Rom provincial administration. A synod required a chairman, and various usages obtained about the natural chairman. At first the oldest bishop present was placed in the chair, and this continued long to be the practice in several parts of the empire. Gradually it became the habit to put into the chair the bishop of the town in which the council met, and this grew to a prescriptive right. It was then that the bishops of the towns which were the meeting-places of synods came to be called metropolitans. The title was for long one of courtesy only and did not carry with it any ecclesiastical rank and authority. But by the middle of the 4th cent. the metropolitans had acquired the right to summon the synods and even to exercise some authority over the bishops of the bounds, esp. in the matter of election and consecration. When Christianity was thoroughly established as the religion of the empire, the more important bishops secured for themselves the civil precedence and privileges which had belonged to the higher priests of the abandoned Imperial Cult, and the higher ranks of the Christian ministry came into the possession of a lordship strangely at variance with their earlier position of service.

MINNI, min'ī (מִנִּי, minni): A kingdom mentioned in Jer 51 27, along with Ararat and Ashkenaz, as assailants of Babylon. It is identified with the Minnai of the Assyrian inscriptions, in close relation with, or part of, Armenia.

MINNITH, min'ith (מִנִּית, minnith; B, ἡχρὸς Ἀρνών, áchris Arnón, A, εἰς Σερμωῖθ, eis Se-mōeith): After Jephthah defeated the Ammonites, he is said to have smitten them from Aroer "until thou come to Minnith" (Jgs 11 33). Onom mentions a place called Maanith, 4 Rom miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia ('Ammān) and locates Abel-cheramim, which is mentioned with Minnith, 7 miles from Philadelphia, without indicating the direction. Some travelers have spoken of a Menjah, 7 miles E. of Heshbon, but of this place Tristram (Land of Moab, 140) could find no trace. The same place appears to be mentioned in Ezk 27 17 as supplying wheat, which figures in the trade between Judah and Tyre. There are really no reliable data on which to suggest an identification, while there are grave reasons to suspect the integrity of the text. W. EWING

MINSTREL, min'stel. See MUSIC.

MINT, mint (μήνισμον, hēdiōsmon): Mentioned (Mt 23 23; Lk 11 42) as one of the small things which were tithed. The cultivated variety (Mentha piperita), "peppermint," was doubtless primarily intended, but the wild M. silvestris or horsemint, which flourishes all over the mountains of Pal, is probably included.

MIPHKAD, mif'kad, GATE OF (שַׁר הַמִּפְקָד, sha'ar ha-miphkād; RV "Hammiphkad" [Neh 3 31]): A gate in, or near, the north end of the east wall of Jerus, rebuilt under Nehemiah. Its exact position is uncertain. See JERUSALEM.

I. Nature of Miracle.—"Miracle" is the general term for the wonderful phenomena which accompanied the Jewish and Christian revelation, esp. at critical moments, and which are alleged to have been continued, under certain conditions, in the history of the Christian church. The miracle proper is a work of God (Ex 7 3 ff.; Dt 4 34, 35, etc.; Jn 3 2; 9 32, 33; 10 38; Acts 10 38, etc.); but as supernatural acts miracles are recognized as possible to evil agencies (Mt 24 24; 2 Thess 2 9; Rev 13 14; 16 14, etc.).

The Bib. idea of miracle as an extraordinary work of God, generally though not invariably ("providential" miracles—see below, II, 6), transcending the ordinary powers of Nature, wrought in connection with the ends of revelation, is illustrated by the terms used to describe miracles in the OT and NT. One class of terms brings out the unusual, exceptional, and striking character of the works, as פֶּלָא, pele', נִפְלְאוֹת, niphla'oth (Ex 3 20; 15 11, etc), répas, téras, lit. "a portent" (in pl. Mt 24 24; Acts 2 22.43, etc); another lays stress on the power displayed in them, as מְבַרְכִים, gbbhūrāh, dōvāmus, dīnamis (in pl. "mighty works," RVm "powers," Mt 11 20.21.23; 13 54; 14 2; 2 Cor 12 12, etc); a third gives prominence to their teleological significance—their character as "signs," as מֹפְתִים, 'ōth (pl. RV "signs," Nu 14 22; Dt 11 3, etc), σημεῖον, sēmeion (pl. RV "signs," Jn 2 11.23, and frequently; Acts 4 16.22; 6 8; Rev 13 14, etc). Another OT word for "wonder" or "miracle" is מֹפֶת, mōphēth (Ex 7 9; Dt 29 3). See, further, below, III, 4.

II. Miracle in the NT.—The subject of miracles has given rise to much abstract discussion; but it is best approached by considering the

1. Miracles actual facts involved, and it is best in Gospel to begin with the facts nearest to us: History those which are recorded in the NT.

Our Lord's ministry was attended from first to last by events entirely beyond the ordinary course of Nature. He was born of a Virgin, and His birth was announced by angels, both to His mother, and to the man to whom she was betrothed (Mt and Lk). He suffered death on the cross as an ordinary man, but on the third day after His crucifixion He rose from the tomb in which He was buried, and lived with His disciples for 40 days (Acts 1 3), eating and drinking with them, but with a body superior to ordinary physical conditions. At length He ascended to the heavens, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. But besides these two great miracles of His birth and His resurrection, Jesus was continually performing miracles during His ministry. His own words furnish the best description of the facts. In reply to the question of John the Baptist, His predecessor, He said, "Go and tell John the things which ye hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good tidings preached to them" (Mt 11 4.5). Specimens of these miracles are given in detail in the Gospel narratives; but it is a mistake to consider the matter, as is too often done, as though these particular miracles were the only ones in question. Even if they could be explained away, as has often been attempted, there would remain reiterated statements of the evangelists, such as St. Matthew's that He "went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people" (4 23), or St. Luke's "And a great number of the people from all Judaea and Jerus, and the seacoast of Tyre and Sidon, who came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; and they that were troubled with unclean spirits were healed. And all the multitude sought to touch him; for power came forth from him, and healed them all" (6 17-19).

It must be borne in mind that if there is any assured result of modern criticism, it is that these accounts proceed from contemporaries and eyewitnesses, and with respect 2. Special Testimony to the third evangelist there is one of St. Luke unique consideration of great import.

The researches of Dr. Hobart have proved to the satisfaction of a scholar like Harnack, that St. Luke was a trained physician. His testimony to the miracles is therefore the nearest thing possible to the evidence which has often been desired—that of a man of science. When St. Luke, e.g., tells us of the healing of a fever (4 38.39), he uses the technical term for a violent fever recognized in his time (cf Meyer, in loc.); his testimony is therefore that of one who knew what fevers and the healing of them meant. This consideration is esp. valuable in reference to the miracles recorded of St. Paul in the latter part of Acts. It should always be borne in mind that they are recorded by a physician, who was an eyewitness of them.

It seems to follow from these considerations that the working of miracles by Our Lord, and by St.

Paul in innumerable cases, cannot be questioned without attributing to the evangelists a wholesale untrustworthiness, due either to wilful, or to in Gospels superstitious misrepresentation, and and Acts this is a supposition which will certainly never commend itself to a fair and competent judgment. It would involve, in fact, such a sweeping condemnation of the evangelists, that it could never be entertained at all except under one presupposition, viz. that such miraculous occurrences, as being incompatible with the established laws of Nature, could not possibly have happened, and that consequently any allegations of them must of necessity be attributed to illusion or fraud.

III. Miracle and Laws of Nature.—This, in fact, is the prejudgment or prejudice which has prompted, either avowedly or tacitly, the great mass of negative criticism on this subject, and if it could be substantiated, we should be confronted, in the Gospels, with a problem of portentous difficulty.

1. Pre-judgment of fact, and if it could be substantiated, Negative Criticism we should be confronted, in the Gospels, with a problem of portentous difficulty.

On this question of the abstract possibility of miracles, it seems sufficient to quote the following passage from the Gifford Lectures for 1891 of the late eminent man of science, Professor Sir George Stokes.

2. Sir George Stokes Quoted On p. 23 Professor Stokes says: "We know very well that a man may in general act uniformly according to a certain rule, and yet for a special reason may on a particular occasion act quite differently. We cannot refuse to admit the possibility of something analogous taking place as regards the action of the Supreme Being. If we think of the laws of Nature as self-existent and uncaused, then we cannot admit any deviation from them. But if we think of them as designed by a Supreme Will, then we must allow the possibility of their being on some particular occasion suspended. Nor is it even necessary, in order that some result out of the ordinary course of Nature should be brought about, that they should even be suspended; it may be that some different law is brought into action, whereby the result in question is brought about, without any suspension whatever of the laws by which the ordinary course of Nature is regulated. . . . It may be that the event which we call a miracle was brought about, not by any suspension of the laws in ordinary operation, but by the superaddition of something not ordinarily in operation, or, if in operation, of such a nature that its operation is not perceived."

Only one consideration need be added to this decisive scientific statement, viz. that if there be agencies and forces in existence out-

3. Effects on Nature Agencies side the ordinary world of Nature, and if they can under certain circumstances interpose in it, they must necessarily produce effects inconsistent with the processes of that world when left to itself.

Life under the surface of the water has a certain course of its own when undisturbed; but if a man standing on the bank of a river throws a stone into it, effects are produced which must be as unexpected and as unaccountable as a miracle to the creatures who live in the stream. The nearness of two worlds which are absolutely distinct from one another receives, indeed, a striking illustration from the juxtaposition of the world above the water and the world below its surface. There is no barrier between them; they are actually in contact; yet the life in them is perfectly distinct. The spiritual world may be as close to us as the air is to the water, and the angels, or other ministers of God's will, may as easily, at His word, interpose in it as a man can throw a stone into the water. When a stone is thus thrown, there is no suspension or modification of any law; it is simply that, as Sir George Stokes supposes in the case of a miracle, a new agency has interposed.

This, indeed, is the main fact of which miracles are irresistible evidence. They show that some 4. Agreement with Biblical Idea and Terms power outside Nature, some supernatural power, has intervened. They are exactly described by the three words in the NT already mentioned. They are terata, "prodigies" or "wonders"; they are also dynameis, virtutes, "powers," or "manifestation of powers"; and finally they are semeia, "signs." The three conceptions are combined, and the source of such manifestations stated with them, in a pregnant verse of He: "God also bearing witness with them, both by signs and wonders, and by manifold powers, and by gifts of the Holy Spirit, according to his own will" (2 4).

The words of J. S. Mill on the question of the possibility of miracles may also be quoted. Dealing with the objection of Hume in his Essay on Miracles,

5. J. S. Mill on Miracle cles, Mill observes: "In order that any alleged fact should be contradictory to a law of causation, the allegation must be, not simply that the cause existed without being followed by the effect, for that would be no uncommon occurrence; but that this happened in the absence of any adequate counteracting cause. Now in the case of an alleged miracle, the assertion is the exact opposite of this. It is that the effect was defeated, not in the absence, but in consequence, of a counteracting cause, namely, a direct interposition of an act of the will of some being who has power over Nature; and in particular of a Being, whose will being assumed to have endowed all the causes with the powers by which they produce their effects, may well be supposed able to counteract them. A miracle (as was justly remarked by Brown) is no contradiction to the law of cause and effect; it is a new effect, supposed to be produced by the introduction of a new cause. Of the adequacy of that cause, if present, there can be no doubt; and the only antecedent improbability which can be ascribed to the miracle is the improbability that any such cause existed" (System of Logic, II, 161-62).

There is, however, one other important characteristic of miracles—of those at least with which

6. Miracle as Connected with Command we are concerned—viz. that they occur at the command, or at the prayer, of the person to whom they are attributed. This is really their most significant feature, and the one upon which their whole evidential value depends. One critic has compared the fall of the fortifications of Jellalabad, on a critical occasion, with the fall of the walls of Jericho, as though the one was no more a miracle than the other. But the fall of the walls of Jericho, though it may well have been produced by some natural force, such as an earthquake, bears the character of a miracle because it was predicted, and was thus commanded by God to occur in pursuance of the acts prescribed to Joshua. Similarly the whole significance of Our Lord's miracles is that they occur at His word and in obedience to Him. "What manner of man is this," exclaimed the disciples, "that even the winds and the sea obey him?" (Mt 8 27).

IV. Evidential Value of Miracle.—This leads us to the true view of the value of miracles as proofs of a revelation. This is one of the

1. Miracles as Proofs of Revelation points which has been discussed in far too abstract a manner. Arguments have been, and still are, constructed to show that there can be no real revelation without miracles, that miracles are the proper proof of a revelation, and so on. It is always a perilous method of argument, perhaps a presumptuous one, to attempt to determine whether God could produce a given result in any other way than the one which He has actually adopted. The only safe, and the sufficient, method of proceeding is to consider whether as a matter of fact, and in what way, the miracles which are actually recorded do guarantee the particular revelation in question.

Consider Our Lord's miracles in this light. Assuming, on the grounds already indicated, that they actually occurred, they prove

2. Miracles of Christ in This Relation beyond doubt that He had supreme command over Nature; that not only the winds and the sea, but the human soul and body obeyed him, and in the striking words of the Eng. service for the Visitation of the Sick, that He was "Lord of life and death, and of all things thereto pertaining, as youth, strength, health, age, weakness and sickness." This is the grand fact which the miracles establish. They are not like external evidence, performed in attestation of a doctrine. They are direct and eloquent evidence of the cardinal truth of our faith, that Our Lord possessed powers which belong to God Himself. But they are not less direct evidence of the special office He claimed toward the human race—that of a Saviour. He did not merely work wonders in order that men might believe His assertions about Himself, but His wonderful works, His powers—virtutes—were direct evidence of their truth. He proved that He was a Saviour by doing the works of a Saviour, by healing men and women from their diseases of both body and soul. It is well known that salvation in the true sense, viz. saving men out of evils and corruptions into which they have fallen, is an idea which was actually introduced into the world by the gospel. There was no word for it in the Rom language. The ancients know of a servator, but not of a salvator. The essential message of the miracles is that they exhibit Our Lord in this character—that of one who has alike the will and the power to save. Such is Our Lord's own application of them in His answer, already quoted, to the disciples of John the Baptist (Mt 11 4,5).

It is therefore an extraordinary mistake to suppose that the evidence for our faith would not be damaged if the miracles were set aside.

3. Miracles Part of Revelation We should lose the positive evidence we now possess of Our Lord's saving power. In this view, the miracles are not the mere proofs of a revelation; they are themselves the revelation. They reveal a Saviour from all human ills, and there has been no other revelation in the world of such a power. The miracles recorded of the apostles have a like effect. They are wrought, like St. Peter's of the impotent man, as evidence of the living power of the Saviour (Acts 3, 4). "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even in him doth this man stand here before you whole. . . . And in none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved" (4 10,12). In a word, the miracles of the NT, whether wrought by Our Lord or by His apostles, reveal a new source of power, in the person of Our Lord, for the salvation of men. Whatever interference they involve with the usual order of Nature is due, not to any modification of that order, but to the intervention of a new force in it. The nature of that force is revealed by them, and can only be ascertained by observation of them. A man is known by his words and by his deeds, and to these two sources of revelation, respecting His person and character, Our Lord expressly appealed. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do them, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (Jn 10 37.38).

It is therefore a mistake to try to put the evidence of the miracles into a logically demonstrative argument. Paley stated the case too much in this almost anathematized form.

"It is idle," he said, "to say that a future state had been discovered already. It had been discovered as the Copernican system was; it was one guess among many. He alone discovers who proves; and no man can prove this point but the teacher who testifies by miracles that his doctrine comes from God" (Moral and Polit. Philosophy, book V, ch ix, close).

Coleridge, in the Aids to Reflection, criticizes the above and puts the argument in a juster and more human form.

"Most fervently do I contend, that the miracles worked by Christ, both as miracles and as fulfilments of prophecy, both as signs and as wonders, made plain discovery, and gave unquestionable proof, of His Divine character and authority: that they were to the whole Jewish nation true and appropriate evidences, that He was indeed come who had promised and declared to their forefathers, Behold your God will come with vengeance, even God, with a recompense! He will come and save you. I receive them as proofs, therefore, of the truth of every word which He taught who was Himself the Word: and as sure evidences of the final victory over death and of the life to come, in that they were manifestations of Him who said: I am the resurrection and the life!" (note prefatory to Aphorism CXXIII).

This seems the fittest manner in which to contemplate the evidence afforded by miracles.

V. Miracles in the OT.—If the miracles ascribed to Our Lord and His apostles are established on the grounds now stated, and are of the value just explained, there can be with NT little difficulty in principle in accepting Miracles as credible and applying the miracles of the OT. They also are obviously wrought as manifestations of a Divine Being, and as evidences of His character and will.

This, e.g., was the great purpose of the miracles wrought for the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt. The critical theories

2. The Mosaic Miracles which treat the narrative of those events as "unhistorical" are, I am convinced, unsound. If they could be established, they would deprive us of some of the most precious evidences we possess of the character of God. But, in any case, the purpose to which the alleged miracles are ascribed is of the same character as in the case of the NT miracles. "For ask now," says Moses, "of the days that are past . . . whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever a people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by trials, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by an outstretched arm, and by great terrors, according to all that Jeh your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? Unto thee it was showed, that thou mightest know that Jeh he is God; there is none else besides him" (Dt 4 32-35). The God of the Jews was, and is, the God manifested in those miraculous acts of deliverance. Accordingly, the Ten Commandments are introduced with the declaration: "I am Jeh thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," and on this follows: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" (Ex 20 2.3). Without these miracles, the God of the Jews would be an abstraction. As manifested in them, He is the living God, with a known character, "a just God and a Saviour" (Isa 45 21), who can be loved with all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength.

The subsequent miracles of Jewish history, like those wrought by Elijah, serve the same great end, and reveal more and more both of the

3. Subsequent Miracles will and the power of God. They are not mere portents, wrought as an external testimony to a doctrine. They are the acts of a living Being wrought through His ministers, or with their coöperation, and He is revealed by them. If the miracles of the NT were possible, those of the OT were possible, and as those of the NT reveal the nature and will of Christ, by word and deed, so those of the OT reveal the existence, the nature, and the will of God. Nature, indeed, reveals God, but the miracles reveal new and momentous acts of God; and the whole religious life of the Jews, as the Pss show, is indissolubly bound up with them. The evidence for them is, in fact, the historic consciousness of a great and tenacious nation.

It should be added that the Jewish Scriptures embody one of the greatest of miracles—that of prophecy. It is obvious that the 4. Prophecy as Miracle destiny of the Jewish people is predicted from the commencement, in the narrative of the life of Abraham and onward. There can, moreover, be no question that the office of the Christ had been so distinctly foreshadowed in the Scriptures of the OT that the people, as a whole, expected a Messiah before He appeared. Our Lord did not, like Buddha or Mohammed, create a new office; He came to fill an office which had been described by the prophets, and of which they had predicted the functions and powers. We are told of the Saviour, "And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself" (Lk 24 27). That, again, is a revelation of God's nature, for it reveals Him as "knowing the end from the beginning," and as the Ruler of human life and history.

VI. Ecclesiastical Miracles.—Some notice, finally, must be taken of the question of what are called ecclesiastical miracles. There seems

1. Probability of Such Miracles no sufficient reason for assuming that miracles ceased with the apostles, and there is much evidence that in the early church miraculous cures, both of body and soul, were sometimes vouchsafed.

There were occasions and circumstances when the manifestation of such miraculous power was as appropriate as testimony of the living power of Christ, as in the scenes in the Acts. But they were not recorded under inspired guidance, like the miracles of the Apostolic Age, and they have in many cases been overlaid by legend.

The observation in Pascal's Thoughts eminently applies to this class of miracles: "It has appeared to me that the

2. Pascal Quoted real cause [that there are so many false miracles, false revelations, etc.] is that there are true ones, for it would not be possible that there should be so many false miracles unless there were true, nor so many false religions unless there were one that is true. For if all this had never been, it is impossible that so many others should have believed it. . . . Thus instead of concluding that there are no true miracles since there are so many false, we must on the contrary say that there are true miracles since there are so many false, and that false miracles exist only for the reason that there are true; so also that there are false religions only because there is one that is true" (On Miracles).

VII. Miracle in Works of Grace.—It has lately been argued with much earnestness and force in Germany, particularly by J. Wendland, in his Miracles and Christianity, that belief in miracles is indispensable to our apprehension of a real living God, and to our trust in His saving work in our own souls. The work of grace and salvation, indeed, is all so far miraculous that it requires the influence upon our nature of a living power above that nature. It is not strictly correct to call it miraculous, as these operations of God's Spirit are now an established part of His kingdom of grace. But they none the less involve the exercise of a like supernatural power to that exhibited in Our Lord's miracles of healing and casting out of devils; and in proportion to the depths of man's Christian life will he be compelled to believe in the gracious operation on his soul of this Divine interposition.

On the whole, it is perhaps increasingly realized that miracles, so far from being an excrescence on Christian faith, are indissolubly bound up with it, and that there is a complete unity in the manifestation of the Divine nature, which is recorded in the Scriptures.

MIRACLES, GIFT OF. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS; MIRACLE.

MIRAGE, mē-rāzh' (מִרְאָה, shārābh, "heat-mirage"; Arab. سَرَاب, sarāb, from vb. سَرَب, "to go forth," "to flow"; hence "flowing of water"): "The glowing sand shall become a pool, and the thirsty ground springs of water" (Isa 35 7); AV has "parched ground" and RVm "mirage." The same Heb word is also used in Isa 49 10, "Neither shall the heat [m "mirage"] nor sun smite them." These are the only uses of the word in the Scriptures, although mirages are very common in the drier parts of the country. However, the context in both cases seems to justify the tr usually given, rather than "mirage." ALFRED H. JOY

MIRE, mīr. See CHALKSTONE; CLAY; MARSH.

MIRIAM, mir'i-am (מִרְיָם, miryām; LXX and the NT Μαριάμ, Mariām; EV of the NT "Mary"):

(1) Daughter of Amram and Jochebed, and sister of Aaron and Moses. It is probable that it was she who watched the ark of bulrushes in which the child Moses was laid (Ex 2 4). She associated herself with her brothers in the exodus, is called "the prophetess," and led the choir of maidens who sang the triumph-song after the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 15 20f). Along with Aaron, she opposed Moses at Hazeroth (Nu 12 1-5). She was smitten with leprosy in punishment, but on Aaron's intercession was pardoned and healed (Nu 12 10-15). She died and was buried at Kadesh (Nu 20 1). In the Deuteronomic Law respecting leprosy, Miriam is mentioned as a warning to the Israelites (Dt 24 8f). In Mic 6 4, she is referred to along with Moses and Aaron as a leader of God's people.

(2) Son (or daughter) of Jether (1 Ch 4 17). The latter half of the verse is in its present situation unintelligible; it should probably follow ver 18 (see Curtis, Chron., in loc.). JOHN A. LEES

MIRMAH, mûr'ma (מִרְמָה, mirmāh, "deceit"): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 10).

MIRROR, mir'ēr. See LOOKING-GLASS.

MISAEEL, mis'ā-el, mī'sā-el (A, Μισαήλ, Misaēl, B, Μεισαήλ, Meisaēl):

(1) One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand as he expounded the Law (1 Esd 9 44="Mishael," Neh 8 4).

(2) In Three ver 66 (LXX Dnl 3 88), for "Mishael," one of Daniel's companions in captivity.

MISAIAS, mi-sā'yas, mi-sī'as: RVm="Masias."

MISCHIEF, mis'chif: The word, in the sense of "hurt" or "evil" befalling, plotted against, or done to, anyone, represents a variety of Heb terms (e.g. 'āšōn, AV Gen 42 4; 44 29; Ex 21 22; ra', 1 S 23 9; 2 S 16 8; 1 K 11 25, etc; 'āmāl, Ps 7 14. 16; 10 7.14; Prov 24 2, etc). Sometimes RV changes the word, as to "evil" (Ex 32 12.22); in Acts 13 10, to "villany" (βαδουργία, rhadiourgia).

In RV Apoc the word is used for kaká, kaká, "evils," Ad Est 13 5 (cf Sir 19 28); kakia, kakia, "evil," 1 Macc 7 23; and Lat malum, "evil," 2 Esd 15 56 "Mischievous" is used, Ad Est 14 19, for πονηρεύομαι, ponēreúomai, "to be evil." The use in AV Apoc is considerably more extended (Sir 11 33; 19 27; 27 27, etc).

JAMES ORR

MISGAB, mis'gab (מִשְׁגָּב, ha-misgābh; B, Ἀμάθ, Amáth, A, τὸ κραταίωμα, tó krataiōma): Named with Nebo and Kiriathaim in the denunciation of doom against Moab (Jer 48 1). No trace of any name resembling this has been found. Possibly we should take it, not as a place-name, but as an appellation of some strong fortress, perhaps of Kir-moab itself. The term is elsewhere trd "high fortress" (Isa 25 12, etc).

MISHAEL, mish'ā-el, mī'shā-el (מִישָׁאֵל, mī-shā'ēl, perhaps="who is equal to God"):

(1) A Kohathite, 4th in descent from Levi (Ex 6 22). He and his brother Elzaphan carried out Moses' order to remove from the sanctuary and the camp the corpses of Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10 4 f).

(2) A supporter of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4).

(3) The Heb name of one of Daniel's 3 companions (Dnl 1 6.7.11.19; 2 17). His Bab name was MESHACH (q.v.).

MISHAL, mī'shal (מִשָּׁאֵל, mish'al): A town in the territory of Asher (Josh 19 26, AV "Misheal," Maasá, Maasá), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 30; B, Βασελλάρ, Bassellár, A, Maasál, Maasál="Mashal" of 1 Ch 6 74). Onom (s.v. "Masan") places it near Carmel by the sea. It is not identified.

MISHAM, mī'sham (מִשָּׁם, mish'am): A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (1 Ch 8 12).

MISHEAL, mish'ē-al. See MISHAL.

MISHMA, mish'ma (מִשְׁמָה, mishmā):

(1) A son of Ishmael (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30).

(2) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 25).

MISHNA, mish'na. See TALMUD.

MISHNEH, mish'ne (מִשְׁנֵה, ha-mishneh; 2 K 22 14; 2 Ch 34 22, AV "college," RV "second quarter" m "Heb Mishneh"; Zeph 1 10, AV "the second," RV "second quarter," m "Heb Mishneh"): A part of Jerus, apparently not far from the Fish Gate (q.v.) and the MAKTESH (q.v.). The tr "college" is due to Tg Jon on 2 K 22 14. The RV interpretation of Mishneh is connected with the belief that Hezekiah, when he built "the other wall without" (1 Ch 32 5), made the second wall on the N. There seems little evidence of this (see JERUSALEM, VI, 11), and the "second" may refer to the district of the city on the west hill or perhaps to the hill itself. See COLLEGE.

MISHOR, mi'shor. See PLAIN, and also note in HDB, III, 309.

MISHRAITES, mish'rā-its (הַמִּשְׁרָאִי, ha-mish-rā'ī): One of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53).

MISPAR, mis'pār (מִסְפָּר, mispar): An exile who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2). AV spells the name "Mizpar." In the v. verse of Neh it appears as "Mispereth" (Neh 7 7).

MISPERETH, mis'pē-reth (מִסְפֶּרֶת, mispereth). See MISPAP.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM, miz-rē-fōth-mā'im (מִסְרֵפּוֹת מַיִם, misrēphōth mayim; LXX Μασιρών, Maserōn, Μασιρεθ Μερφωμαι, Maserēth Memphō-maim): A place to which Joshua chased the various tribes, which were confederated under Jabin, after their defeat at the waters of Merom (Josh 11 8). It follows the mention of great Sidon, as though it was a place in the same region but farther from the point of departure. In Josh 13 6, it is also mentioned in connection with the Sidonians, as though it was included in their territory, so it must have been in the coast district, or Phoenicia, which was in that period dominated by Sidon. The Canaanites who were among the tribes forming the hosts of Jabin would naturally seek refuge among their brethren in Sidon and its territory. They fled across the hill country which lies between the waters of Merom and the coast, but as Sidon is situated considerably to the N. of Merom, some would seek the coast by a more southerly route, and we may look for Misrephoth-maim there. Dr. Thomson (LB, II, 266-67, ed 1882) locates it at Ras el-Musheirifeh, some 13 miles S. of Tyre, where there was a stronghold, and where the fugitives might find refuge (see LADDER OF TYRE). Though the name hardly suggests Misrephoth-maim, the identification may be accepted until some better one is found. H. PORTER

MIST (מִטָּה, 'ēdh; ἀχλὺς, achlūs, ὁμίχλη, homíchlē): Mist is caused by particles of water vapor filling the air until it is only partially transparent. Mist and haze produce much the same effect, the one being due to moisture in the atmosphere and the other to dust particles. Mist or fog is not common on the plains of Pal and Syria at sea-level, but is of almost daily occurrence in the mountain valleys, coming up at night and disappearing with the morning sun (Wisd 2 4). It is nothing else than a cloud touching the land. In the account of creation, "there went up a mist from the earth," giving a description of the warm humid atmosphere of the carboniferous ages which agrees remarkably with the teaching of modern science (Gen 2 6). The word is used fig. in Acts 13 11 to describe the shutting-out of light. Those who bring confusion and uncertainty are compared to "mists driven by a storm" (2 Pet 2 17). See VAPOR. ALFRED H. JOY

MISTRESS, mis'tres (מִסְתֵּרֶת, ba'ālāh, מִסְתֵּרֶת, gbbhereth): Is the tr of ba'ālāh, "lady," "owner" (1 K 17 17; Nah 3 4); in 1 S 28 7, "a woman that hath a familiar spirit" is lit. "the mistress of a familiar spirit"; of gbbhereth (Gen 16 4.8.9; 2 K 5 3; Ps 123 2; Prov 30 23; Isa 24 2); in Isa 47 5.7, we have AV and ERV "lady," ARV "mistress."

MITE, mīt (λεπτόν, leptón): The smallest copper or bronze coin current among the Jews. They were first struck by the Maccabean princes with Heb legends, and afterward by the Herods and the Rom procurators with Gr legends. The "widow's mite" mentioned in Mk 12 42 and Lk 21 2 was probably of the first kind, since those with Gr legends were regarded as unlawful in the temple service. According to Mk, the lepton was only half a kodrantēs (Lat quadrans), which would indicate a value of about one-fourth of a cent or half an Eng. farthing. See MONEY. H. PORTER

MITHKAH, mith'ka (מִתְקָה, mithkāh, "sweetness"; AV Mithcah): Name given owing to sweetness of pasture or water. A desert camp of the Israelites between Terah and Hashmonah (Nu 33 28f). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MITHNITE, mith'nīt (מִיתְנִי, ha-mithnī): Designation of Jehoshaphat, one of David's officers (1 Ch 11 43).

MITHRADATES, mith-ra-dā'tēz (A, Μιθραδάτης, Mithradātēs, B, Μιθριδάτης, Mithridātēs; AV Mithridates):

(1) The treasurer of Cyrus to whom the king committed the vessels which had been taken from the temple and who delivered them to the governor, Sanabassar (1 Esd 2 11="Mithredath" of Ezr 1 8).

(2) Apparently another person of the same name—one of the commissioners stationed in Samaria who wrote a letter to Artaxerxes persuading him to put a stop to the rebuilding of Jerus (1 Esd 2 16="Mithredath" of Ezr 4 7). S. ANGUS

MITHREDATH, mith'rē-dath (מִיתְרֶדָת, mith-rēdhāth; Pers="gift of Mithra" or "consecrated to Mithra"):

(1) The Pers treasurer through whom Cyrus restored the sacred vessels to the returning Jewish exiles (Ezr 1 8).

(2) A Persian, perhaps an official, who was associated with Bishlam and Tabeel in corresponding with Artaxerxes concerning the restoration of Jerus (Ezr 4 7). In 1 Esd 2 11.16, the name is written MITHRADATES (q.v.).

MITRE, mi'tēr: In AV this word renders two Heb words, both of which, however, come from the same stem, viz. מִצְנֶה, zānaph, "to coil" or "to wrap round." In Ex 28, a mitre (RVm "turban") is enumerated among Aaron's articles of dress, which were to be made by tailors of recognized skill. On the forefront of the mitre was a "plate of pure gold" with the words "Holy to Jehovah" (i.e. consecrated to Jehovah) inscribed upon it. This gold plate was fastened to the mitre by a blue ribbon. The material of the mitre was fine linen or silk. The word for the headtire (AV "bonnet") of the ordinary priest was a different word. Ezekiel uses the word in connection with Zedekiah (21 26); the prophet associated regal and priestly functions with the throne. It is possible, however, that the two sentences—"remove the mitre," and "take off the crown"—refer to the degradation of the priesthood and of the throne which the downfall of Jerus will involve. The LXX varies between kidarīs and mitra, the former word being used in Sir 45 12.

T. LEWIS

MITYLENE, mit-i-lē'nē, mit-i-lyē'nyē (Μιτυλήνη, Mitulēnē, or Μυτιλήνη, Mutilēnē, as usually on coins):

In antiquity the most important city of the Asiatic Aeolians and of the island of Lesbos. It had 2 harbors and strong fortresses. The city was noted for its high culture and for its zeal for art and science from the earliest times. The island, under the leadership of Mitylene, revolted in 428 BC from the Athenian confederacy. The city was besieged by the Athenians and finally taken. The inhabitants of Mitylene were treated with great severity; the walls were dismantled, and the city was deprived of its power on the sea. In the time of Alexander the Great, Mitylene suffered most through the Persians, and later by the occupation of the Macedonians, but afterward regained its power and prosperity, and still later was favored by the Rom emperors, being made a free city by Pompey.

In the Middle Ages, the name Mitylene was applied to the whole island. The present capital, often called simply Castro, has a large castle built on the site of the ancient acropolis (in 1373). The city was conquered by the Turks in 1462. It contains 14 mosques, 7 churches, and has a population of about 15,000.

On his third missionary journey, Paul traveled to the Hellespont from Philippi, thence through the Troad by land to Assos on the southern side—where extensive excavations were carried on in 1881 by an American archaeological expedition—thence by ship to Mitylene (Acts 20 14), where he spent the night. Leaving Lesbos, he sailed southward to a point opposite the island of Chios (Acts 20 15). There is no record that a Christian church had been established in Mitylene at this time.

MIXED, mikst, MULTITUDE, mul'ti-tūd. See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MIZAR, mī'zār, THE HILL (הַר מִצָּר, har miç'ar; ὄρος μικρός, óros mikrós): The name of a mountain found only in Ps 42 6; "I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and the Hermons, from the hill Mizar." The term may be taken as an appellative meaning "littleness," and the phrase mēhar miç'ar would then mean "from the little mountain," i.e. the little mountain of Zion. Some scholars think that the m in mēhar may have arisen from dittography, and that we should read, "from the land of Jordan, and the Hermons, O thou little mountain [of Zion]." G. A. Smith discusses the question in a note (HGHL, 477). He suggests that certain names found in the district (za'ūrā, wādy za'arah, and Khirbet Mazārā) may be a reminiscence of the name of a hill in the district called Miç'ar; and surely none other would have been put by the Psalmist in apposition to the Hermons. Cheyne says: "To me this appendage to Hermonim seems a poetic loss. Unless the little mountain has a symbolic meaning I could wish it away." I cannot see this: the symbolic meanings suggested for Hermonim and Miç'ar are all forced, and even if we got a natural one, it would be out of place after the literal land of Jordan. To employ all as proper names is suitable to a lyric. No identification is at present possible. W. EWING

MIZPAH, miz'pā, MIZPEH, miz'pe: This name is pointed both ways in the Heb, and is found usually with the article. The meaning seems to be "outlook" or "watchtower." It is natural, therefore, to look for the places so named in high positions, commanding wide prospects.

(1) מִצְפָּה, ha-miçpāh [Gen 31 49; Jgs 11 11.34], מִצְפָּה, miçpāh [Hos 5 1], מִצְפָּה, miçpāh, miçpāh ghil'adh [Jgs 11 29]; Μασσηφά, Massēphā, τὴν σκοπιάν, tēn skopiān, and other forms): It seems probable that the same place is intended in all these passages, and that it is identical with Ramath-mizpeh of Josh 13 26. It is the place where Jacob and Laban parted in Mt. Gilead; consequently it lay to the N. of Mahanaim. Here was the home of Jephthah, to which he returned after the defeat of the Ammonites, only to realize how his rash vow had brought desolation to his house. It was taken by Judas Maccabaeus, who destroyed the inhabitants and burned the city (1 Macc 5 35). Identifications have been suggested with Sūf, Jerash, and Kal'at er-Rabad; but these seem all to lie S. of any possible site for Mahanaim. A ruined site was discovered by Dr. Schumacher (M und NPDV, 1897, 86), with the name Masfā, which is just the Arab. equivalent of the Heb Miçpāh. It lies some distance to the N.W. of Jerash and claims consideration in any attempt to fix the site of Mizpah.

(2) מִצְפָּה, 'ereç ha-miçpāh [Josh 11 3], מִצְפָּה, bik'ath miçpāh [ver 8]; Μασσευμάν, Massēumán, Μασσηφάθ, Massēphāth, and other forms): The "land of Mizpah" and the "valley of Mizpah" may be taken as applying to the same district. It lay on the southwest slopes of Hermon N.E. of the Waters of Merom. The site must be looked for on one of the heights in the region indicated, from which a wide view is obtained. Mutallah, a Druze village standing on a hill to the N. of 'Aḥil, and E. of Nahr el-Hasbāny, was suggested by Robinson. The present writer agrees with Buhl (GAP, 240) that the ancient castle above Banias, Kal'at es-Subeibeh, occupies a more likely position.

(3) מִצְפָּה, miçpāh; Μασφά, Masphā): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Dilan, Joktheel and Lachish (Tell el-Hesi). Onom mentions a Masfa in the neighborhood of Eleutheropolis, to the N. The identification proposed by Van de Velde and Guérin would suit this description. They would locate Mizpeh at Tell es-Sāfiyeh, about 7½ miles N.W. of Beit Jibrin, "a conspicuous hill with a glittering white cliff rising like an isolated block above the adjacent country" (PEFS, 1903, 276). Many identify this site with Gath, but the name and character of the place point rather to identification with Mizpeh, the Blanche Garde or Alba Specula of the Middle Ages.

(4) מִצְפָּה, ha-miçpāh; Μασσημά, Massēmā, Μασφά, Masphā): A town in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 26). Hither came the men of Israel to deal with the Benjamites after the outrage on the Levite's concubine (Jgs 20 1.3; 21 1.5.8). At Mizpah, Samuel gathered his countrymen. While there crying to God in their distress, they were attacked by the Philis, whom they defeated with great slaughter (1 S 7 5, etc.). Here also Saul, the son of Kish, was chosen king, after which Samuel told the people the "manner of the kingdom" (10 17, etc.). Mizpah was fortified by Asa, king of Judah, with materials which Baasha, king of Israel, had used to fortify Ramah (1 K 15 22; 2 Ch 16 6). When Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerus and made Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, governor of the remnant of the people left in the land of Judah, the governor's residence was fixed at Mizpah (2 K 25 23). Here he was joined by Jeremiah, whom Nebuzaradan, captain of the Bab guard, had set free. At Mizpah, Ishmael, son of Nathaniah, treacherously slew Gedaliah and many who were with him. Two days later he murdered a company of pilgrims, throwing their dead bodies into the great cistern which Asa had made when strengthening the place against possible attack by Baasha of Samaria. He then made prisoners of the people, including the king's daughters, and attempted to convey them away to the Ammonites, an attempt that was frustrated by Johanan, son of Kareah (Jer 40, 41). Mizpah was the scene of memorable assembly in a day of sore anxiety for Judah, when Judas Maccabaeus called the warriors of Judah together for counsel and prayer (1 Mace 3 46). From this passage we also learn that the place was an ancient sanctuary—"for in Mizpah there was a place of prayer aforesaid for Israel."

It has been proposed to identify Mizpah with Tell Nasbeh, a site on the watershed S. of Bireh. The Abbé Raboisson established the fact that Jerus can be seen from this point. In this respect it agrees with Maundeville's description. "It is a very fair and delicious place, and it is called Mt. Joy because it gives joy to pilgrims' hearts, for from that place men first see Jerus." But Jer 41 10 may be taken as decisive against this identification. Ishmael departed to go east. From Tell Nasbeh this would never have brought him to the great waters that are in Gibeon (PEFS, 1898, 169, 251; 1903, 267). A more probable identification is with Nebî Samwîl, a village on high ground 4½ miles N.W. of Jerus, the traditional burying-place of Samuel. It is 2,935 ft. above sea-level, and 500 ft. higher than the surrounding land. Here the pilgrims coming up by way of Beth-horon from Jaffa, the ancient route, first saw the Holy City. The mosque of the village was formerly a church, dating from Crusading times; and here the tomb of Samuel is shown. If this is the ancient Mizpah, a very slight détour to the N. would bring Ishmael to the great waters that are in Gibeon, el-Jîb (Gibeon) being only a mile and a quarter distant.

(5) מִצְפָּה mīṣpāh, mīṣpāh mō'ābh, "Mizpeh of Moab": Μασηφά, Masēphā: A town in Moab to which David took his parents for safety during Saul's pursuit of him (1 S 22 3). It is possibly to be identified with Kir-moab, the modern Kerak, whither David would naturally go to interview the king. But there is no certainty. Possibly we should read "Mizpah" instead of "the hold" in ver 5.

(6) In 2 Ch 20 24, probably we should read "Mizpah" instead of "watch-tower": ha-mīṣpēh la-midbār would then point to a Mizpeh of the Wilderness to be sought in the district of Tekoa (ver 20). W. EWING

MIZPAR, miz'pār. See MISPAR.

MIZRAIM, miz'rā-im (מִצְרַיִם, mīṣrayīm):

(1) A son of Ham, and ancestor of various peoples,

Ludim, Anamim, etc (Gen 10 6.13; 1 Ch 1 8.11). See TABLE of NATIONS.

(2) The name of Egypt. See EGYPT.

The land of Ham.—חָם, hām, was another name for the land of Egypt. It occurs only in Ps 105 23.27; 106 22; Ps 78 51 probably refers to the land of Ham, though it may refer to the children of Ham. The origin and significance of this name are involved in much obscurity. Two improbable etymologies and one probable etymology for Ham as a name of Egypt have been proposed, and the improbable ones very much urged: (1) Ham is often thought to be a Heb appropriation of the Egypt name "Kemt," a name for the "black land" as distinguished from "deshert," the red land of the desert which surrounded it. This etymology is very attractive, but phonetically very improbable to say the least. (2) Ham has sometimes been connected directly with חָם, hām, the second son of Noah whose descendants under the name Micraim occupied a part of Northeastern Africa. But as there is no trace of this name among the Egyptians and no use of it in the historical books of the OT, this can hardly be said to be a probable derivation of the word. (3) There is a third proposed etymology for Ham which connects it ultimately but indirectly with Ham, the second son of Noah. Some of the earliest sculptures yet found in Egypt represent the god Min (Mēnū; cf Koptos by Professor Petrie). This god seems also to have been called Khem, a very exact Egypt equivalent for חָם, hām, the second son of Noah and the ancestor of the Hamitic people of Egypt. That Ham the son of Noah should be deified in the Egypt pantheon is not surprising. The sensuality of this god Min or Khem also accords well with the reputation for licentiousness borne by Ham the son of Noah. These facts suggest very strongly a trace in Egypt mythology of the actual history of the movements of Hamitic people. (4) While the preceding division (3) probably states the real explanation of the early name of Egypt, it still remains to be noted that the use of the name Ham by the Psalmist may be entirely poetic. Until it be found that the name Ham was applied to Egypt by other writers of that period it will ever be in some measure unlikely that the Psalmist was acquainted with the mythological use of the name Ham in Egypt, and so, in equal measure, probable that he meant nothing more than to speak of the land of the descendants of Ham the son of Noah. See also HAM, LAND of.

MIZZAH, miz'a (מִיזָה, mīzzāh, "strong," "firm"): Grandson of Esau, one of the "dukes" of Edom (Gen 36 13.17; 1 Ch 1 37).

MNASON, nā'son, m'nā'son (Μνάσων, Mnāsōn): All that we know of Mnason is found in Acts 21 16. (1) He accompanied Paul and his party from Caesarea on Paul's last visit to Jerus; (2) he was a Cyprian; (3) "an early disciple," an early convert to Christianity, and (4) the one with whom Paul's company was to lodge. The "Western" text of this passage is very interesting. Blass, following D, Syr, reads, for "bringing," etc, "And they brought us to those with whom one should lodge, and when we had come into a certain village we stayed with Mnason a Cyprian, an early disciple, and having departed thence we came to Jerus and the brethren," etc. Meyer-Wendt, Page and Rendell render the accepted text, "bringing us to the house of Mnason," etc. However, giving the imperf. trans of anebainomen, "we were going up" to Jerus (ver 15), we might understand that the company lodged with Mnason on the 1st night of their journey to Jerus, and not at the city itself. "Ver 15, they set about the journey; ver 16, they lodged with Mnason on the introduction of the Caesarean disciples; ver 17, they came to Jerus" (Expos Gr Test., in loc.).

MOAB, mō'ab, MOABITES, mō'ab-its (Moab, מוֹאָב, mō'ābh, Moabite Stone, מוֹאָב, Gr [LXX])

Μωάβ, Mōāb, ἡ Μωαβίτις, hē Mōa-

1. The bēitis, -βίτις, bītis; Moabite, מוֹאָבִי, mō'ābī

Land בְּנֵי מוֹאָב, mō'ābhī; Moabites, בְּנֵי מוֹאָב, bnē mō'ābh): Moab was the district

E. of the Dead Sea, extending from a point some distance N. of it to its southern end. The eastern boundary was indefinite, being the border of the desert which is irregular. The length of the territory was about 50 miles and the average width about 30. It is a high tableland, averaging some 3,000 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean and 4,300 ft. above that of the Dead Sea. The aspect of the land, as one looks at it from the western side of the Dead Sea, is that of a range of mountains with a very precipitous frontage, but the elevation of this ridge above the interior is very slight. Deep chasms lead down from the tableland to the Dead Sea shore, the principal one being the gorge of the river Arnon, which is about 1,700 ft. deep and 2 or more miles in width at the level of the tableland, but very narrow at the bottom and with exceedingly precipitous banks. About 13 miles back from the mouth of the river the gorge divides, and farther back it subdivides, so that several valleys are formed of diminishing depth as they approach the desert border. These are referred to in Nu 21 14 as the "valleys of the Arnon." The "valley of Zered" (Nu 21 12), which was on the southern border, drops down to the southern end of the Dead Sea, and although not so long or deep as the Arnon, is of the same nature in its lower reaches, very difficult to cross, dividing into two branches, but at a point much nearer the sea. The stream is not so large as the Arnon, but is quite copious, even in summer. These gorges have such precipitous sides that it would be very difficult for an army to cross them, except in their upper courses near the desert where they become shallow. The Israelites passed them in that region, probably along the present Hajj road and the line of the Mecca Railway. The tableland is fertile but lacks water. The fountains and streams in the valleys and on the slopes toward the Dead Sea are abundant, but the uplands are almost destitute of flowing water. The inhabitants supply themselves by means of cisterns, many of which are ancient, but many of those used in ancient times are ruined. The population must have been far greater formerly than now. The rainfall is usually sufficient to mature the crops, although the rain falls in winter only. The fertility of the country in ancient times is indicated by the numerous towns and villages known to have existed there, mentioned in Scripture and on the M S, the latter giving some not found elsewhere. The principal of these were: Ar (Nu 21 15); Ataroth, Dibon, Jazer, Nimrah, Nebo (32 3); Beth-peor (Dt 3 29);

Beth-diblaim, Bozrah, Keriath (Jer 48 22-24); Kir (Isa 15 1); Medeba, Elealeh, Zoar (Isa 15 2.4.5); Kirheres (16 11); Sibmah (Josh 13 19); in all some 45 place-names in Moab are known, most of the towns being in ruins. Kir of Moab is represented in the modern Kerak, the most important of all and the government center of the district. Medeba now represents the ancient Medeba, and has become noted for the discovery of a mediaeval map of Pal, in mosaic, of considerable archaeological value. Rabbath-moab and Heshbon (modern Rabba and Hesbân) are miserable villages, and the country is subject to the raids of the Bedawin tribes of the neighboring desert, which discourages agriculture. But the land is still good pasture ground for cattle and sheep, as in ancient times (Nu 32 3.4).

The Moabites were of Sem stock and of kin to the Hebrews, as is indicated by their descent from Lot, the nephew of Abraham (Gen 19 30-37), and by their language which is practically the same as the Heb. This is clear from the inscription on the M S, a monument of Mesha, king of Moab, erected about 850 BC, and discovered among the ruins of Dibon in 1868. It contains 34 lines of about 9 words each, written in the old Phoen and Heb characters, corresponding to the Siloam inscription and those found in Phoenicia, showing that it is a dialect of the Sem tongue prevailing in Pal. The original inhabitants of Moab were the Emim (Dt 2 10), "a people great . . . and tall, as the Anakim." When these were deposed by the Moabites we do not know. The latter are not mentioned in the Am Tab and do not appear on the Egp monuments before the 14th cent. BC, when they seem to be referred to under the name of Ruten, or Luten or Lotan, i.e. Lot (Paton, Syria and Pal); Moab appears in a list of names on a monument of Rameses III of the XXth Dynasty. The country lay outside the line of march of the Egp armies, and this accounts for the silence of its monuments in regard to them.

The chief deity of Moab was Chemosh (כִּמּוֹשׁ, kēmōsh), frequently mentioned in the OT and on the M S, where King Mesha speaks of building a high place in his honor because he was saved by him from his enemies. He represents the oppression of Moab by Omri as the result of the anger of Chemosh, and Mesha made war against Israel by command of Chemosh. He was the national god of Moab, as Molech was of Ammon, and it is pretty certain that he was propitiated by human sacrifices (2 K 3 27). But he was not the only god of Moab, as is clear from the account in Nu 25, where it is also clear that their idolatrous worship was corrupt. They had their Baalim like the nations around, as may be inferred from the place-names compounded with Baal, such as Bamoth-baal, Beth-baal-meon and Baal-peor.

We know scarcely anything of the history of the Moabites after the account of their origin in Gen 19 until the time of the exodus. It would seem, however, that they had suffered from the invasions of the Amorites, who, under their king Sihon, had subdued the northern part of Moab as far as the Arnon (Nu 21 21-31). This conquest was no doubt a result of the movement of the Amorites southward, when they were pressed by the great wave of Hittite invasion that overran Northern Syria at the end of the 15th and the early part of the 14th cents. BC. The Amorites were forced to seek homes in Pal, and it would seem that a portion of them crossed the Jordan and occupied Northern Moab, and here the Israelites found them as they approached the Promised Land. They did not at first disturb the Moabites in the S., but passed around on the eastern border (Dt 2 8.9) and came into conflict with the Amorites in the N. (Nu 21 21-26), defeating them and occupying the territory (vs 31-32). But when Balak son of Zippor, king of Moab, saw what a powerful people was settling on his border, he made alliance with the Midianites against them and called in the aid of Balaam, but as he could not induce the latter to curse them he refrained from attacking the Israelites (Nu 22, 24). The latter, however, suffered disaster from the people of Moab through their intercourse with them (Nu 25). Some time before the establishment of the kingdom in Israel the Midianites overran Moab, as would appear from the passage in Gen 36 35, but the conquest was not permanent, for Moab recovered its lost territory and became strong enough to encroach upon Israel across the Jordan. Eglon of Moab oppressed Israel with the aid of Ammon and Amalek (Jgs 3 13-14), but Eglon was assassinated by Ehud, and the Moabite yoke was cast off after 18 years. Saul smote Moab, but did not subdue it (1 S 14 47), for we find David putting his father and mother under the protection of the king of Moab when persecuted by Saul (1 S 22 3.4). But this friendship between David and Moab did not continue. When David became king he made war upon Moab and completely subjugated it (2 S 8 2). On the division of the kingdom between Rehoboam and Jeroboam the latter probably obtained possession of Moab (1 K 12 20), but it revolted and Omri had to reconquer it (M S), and it was tributary to Ahab (2 K 1 1). It revolted again in the reign of Ahaziah (2 K 1 1; 3 5), and Moab and Ammon made war on Jehoshaphat and Mt. Seir and destroyed the latter, but they afterward fell out among themselves and destroyed each other (2 Ch 20). Jehoshaphat and Jehoram together made an expedition into Moab and defeated the Moabites with great slaughter (2 K 3). But Mesha, king of Moab, was not subdued (ver 27), and afterward completely freed his land from the dominion of Israel (M S). This was probably at the time when Israel and Judah were at war with Hazael of Damascus (2 K 8 28.29). Bands of Moabites ventured to raid the land of Israel when weakened by the conflict with Hazael (2 K 13 20), but Moab was probably subdued again by Jeroboam II (2 K 14 25), which may be the disaster to Moab recounted in Isa 15. After Mesha we find a king of the name of Salamanu and another called Chemosh-nadab, the latter being subject to Sargon of Assyria. He revolted against Sennacherib, in alliance with other kings of Syria and Pal and Egypt, but was subdued by him, and another king, Mutsuri, was subject to Esarhaddon. These items come to us from the Assyrian monuments. When Babylon took the place of Assyria in the suzerainty, Moab joined other tribes in urging Judah to revolt but seems to have come to terms with Nebuchadnezzar before Jerus was taken, as we hear nothing of any expedition of that king against her. On the war described in Jth, in which Moab (1 12, etc) plays a part, see JUDITH.

At a later date Moab was overrun by the Nabathæan Arabs who ruled in Petra and extended their authority on the east side of Jordan even as far as Damascus (Jos, Ant, XIII, xv, 1.2). The Moabites lost their identity as a nation and were afterward confounded with the Arabs, as we see in the statement of Jos (XIII, xiii, 5), where he says that Alexander (Jannæus) overcame the Arabians, such as the Moabites and the Gileadites. Alexander built the famous stronghold of Machærus in Moab, on a hill overlooking the Dead Sea, which afterward became the scene of the imprisonment and tragical death of John the Baptist (Jos, BJ, VII, vi, 2; Ant, XVIII, v, 2; Mk 6 21-28). It was afterward destroyed by the Romans. Kir became a fortress of the Crusaders under the name of Krak (Kerak), which held out against the Moslems until the time of Saladin, who captured it in 1188 AD.

MOABITE STONE: A monument erected at Dibon (Dhibân) by Mesha, king of Moab (2 K 3 4.5), to commemorate his successful revolt from Israel and his conquest of Israelitish territory. It was discovered, August 19, 1868, by a German missionary, Rev. V. Klein, who unfortunately took neither copy nor squeeze of it. It was 3 ft. 10 in. high and 2 ft. broad, with a semicircular top. The Berlin Museum entered into negotiations for the purchase of it, but while these were proceeding slowly, M. Clermont-Ganneau, then dragoman of the French consulate at Jerus, sent agents to take squeezes and tempt the Arabs to sell it for a large sum of money. This led to interference on the part of the Turkish officials, with the result that in 1869 the Arabs lighted a fire under the Stone, and by pouring cold water on it broke it into pieces which they carried away as charms. M. Clermont-Ganneau, however, succeeded in recovering a large proportion of these, and with the help of the squeezes was able to rewrite the greater part of the inscription. The last and most definitive edition of the text was published by Professors Smend and Socin in 1886 from a comparison of the fragments of the original (now in the Louvre) with the squeezes (in Paris and Bâle) and photographs.

The following is (with some unimportant corrections) Dr. Neubauer's tr of the inscription, based upon Smend and Socin's text: "(1) I [am] Mesha, son of Chemosh-melech, king of Moab, the Dibonite: (2) My father reigned over Moab 30 years and I reigned (3) after my father. I have made this monument [or high place] for Chemosh at Qorhah, a monument of salvation, (4) for he saved me from all invaders [or kings], and let me see my desire upon all my enemies. Omri (5) was king of Israel, and he oppressed Moab many days, for Chemosh was angry with his (6) land. His son [Ahab] followed him and he also said: I will oppress Moab. In my days [Chemosh] said: (7) I will see [my desire] on him and his house, and Israel surely shall perish for ever. Omri took the land of (8) Medeba [Nu 21 30], and [Israel] dwelt in it during his days and half the days of his son, altogether 40 years. But Chemosh [gave] it back (9) in my days. I built Baal-Meon [Josh 13 17] and made therein the ditches [or wells]; I built (10) Kirjathaim [Nu 32 37]. The men of Gad dwelt in the land of Ataroth [Nu 32 3] from of old, and the king of Israel built there (11) [the city of] Ataroth; but I made war against the city and took it. And I slew all the [people of] (12) the city, for the pleasure of Chemosh and of Moab, and I brought back from them the Arel [אֶרֶל] of Dodah [דֹּדָה] and bore (13) him before Chemosh in Qeriath [Jer 48 24]. And I placed therein the men of Sharon and the men (14) of Mehereth. And Chemosh said unto me: Go, seize Nebo of Israel and (15) I went in the night and fought against it from the break of dawn till noon; and I took (16) it, slew all of them, 7,000 men and [boys?], women and [girls?], (17) and female slaves, for to Ashtar-Chemosh I devoted them. And I took from thence the Arels [אֶרֶלִים] (18) of Yahweh and bore them before Chemosh. Now the king of Israel had built (19) Jahaz [Isa 15 4], and he dwelt in it while he waged war against me, but Chemosh drove him out from before me. And (20) I took from Moab 200 men, all chiefs, and transported them to Jahaz which I took (21) to add to Dibon. I built Qorhah, the Wall of the Forests and the Wall (22) of the Ophel, and I built its gates and I built its towers. And (23) I built the House of Moloch, and I made sluices for the water-ditches in the midst (24) of the city. And there was no cistern within the city of Qorhah, and I said to all the people: Make for (25) yourselves every man a cistern in his house. And I dug the canals [or conduits] for Qorhah by means of the prisoners (26) from Israel. I built Aroer [Dt 2 36], and I made the road in Arnon. And (27) I built Beth-Bamoth [Nu 26 19] for it was destroyed. I built Bezer [Dt 4 43], for in ruins (28) [it was]. And all the chiefs? of Dibon were 50, for all Dibon is loyal, and I (29) placed 100 [chiefs?] in the cities which I added to the land; I built (30) [Beth]-Medeb[ia] [Nu 21 30] and Beth-diblathaim [Jer 48 22], and Beth-Baal-Meon [Jer 48 23], and transported the shepherds [?] (31) . . . [with] the flock[s] of the land. Now in Horonaim [Isa 15 5] there dwelt [the children ?] . . . (32) . . . [and] Chemosh said unto me: Go down, make war upon Horonaim. So I went down [and made war (33) upon the city, and took it, and] Chemosh dwelt in it during my days. And I went up [?] from thence; I made . . . (34) . . . And I . . ."

The Bib. character of the language of the inscription will be noticed as well as the use of "forty" to signify an indefinite period of time. As in Israel, no goddess seems to have been worshipped in Moab, since the goddess Ashtoreth is deprived of the feminine suffix, and is identified with the male Chemosh (Ashtar-Chemosh). Dodah appears to have been a female divinity worshipped by the side of Yahweh; the root of the name is the same as that of David and the Carthaginian Dido. The Arels were "the champions" of the deity (Assyr qurart), tr<sup>d</sup> "lion-like men" in AV (2 S 23 20; cf Isa 33 7). There was an Ophel in the Moabite capital as well as at Jerus.

The alphabet of the inscription is an early form of the Phoenician, and resembles that of the earliest Gr inscriptions. The words are divided from one another by dots, and the curved forms of some of the letters (b, k, l, m, n) presuppose writing with ink upon papyrus, parchment or potsherds.

The revolt of Mesha took place after Ahab's death (2 K 3 5). At the battle of Qarqar in 854 BC, when the Syrian kings were defeated by Shalmaneser II, no mention is made of Moab, as it was included in Israel. It would seem from the inscription, however, that Medeba had already been restored to Mesha, perhaps in return for the regular payment of his tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams with their wool (2 K 3 4).

For "mocked off" (Job 12 4) RV has "a laughing-stock to"; for "mockers" (Isa 28 22), ERV "scorner," ARV "scoffer"; for "the mockers" (Jer 15 17), "them that made merry"; for "scorneth" (Prov 19 28), "mocketh at"; for "As one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?" (Job 13 9), "As one deceiveth a man will ye deceive him?" (m "mocketh," "mock"); "mock" for "laugh" (Job 9 23); for "There shall come in the last days scoffers" (2 Pet 3 3), "In the last days [m "Gr in the last of the days"] mockers shall come with mockery" (empaigmōnē empatkai).

MODAD, BOOK OF ELDAD AND. See ELDAD AND MODAD, BOOK OF.

MODERATELY, mod'ēr-āt-li (מִדְּרָגָה, liç-dhākāh): "Moderately" is the AV tr of liç-dhākāh, "righteousness" (Joel 2 23, "for he hath given you the former rain moderately," m "according to righteousness," RV "in just measure," m "in [or for] righteousness"). In Phil 4 5 AV, tōe pieikēs is tr'd moderation: "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand," RV "forbearance," m "or gentleness"; cf 2 Cor 10 1. The proper meaning of this word has been the subject of considerable discussion; epieikeia is tr'd "clemency" (Acts 24 4), "gentleness" (of Christ) (2 Cor 10 1); epieikēs is "gentle" (1 Tim 3 3; Tit 3 2; Jas 3 17; 1 Pet 2 18).

Trench says (Synonyms of the NT, 151): "It expresses exactly that moderation which recognizes the impossibility cleaving to formal law, of anticipating and providing for all cases that will emerge and present themselves to it for decision; which, with this, recognizes the danger that ever waits upon the assertion of legal rights, lest they should be pushed into moral wrongs, lest the 'summum jus' should in practice prove the 'summa injuria,' which therefore, pushes not its own rights to the uttermost, but going back in part or in the whole from these, rectifies and redresses the injustices of justice. It is thus more truly just than strict justice would have been; no Latin word exactly and adequately renders it; clementia sets forth one side of it, aequitas another, and perhaps modestia (by which the Vulg tr it in 2 Cor 10 1) a third; but the word is wanting which should set forth all these excellences reconciled in a single and higher one." Its archetype and pattern, he points out, is found in God, who does not stand upon or assert strict rights in His relations to men.

Lightfoot has "forbearance": "Let your gentle and forbearing spirit be recognized by all men. The judgment is drawing nigh." Hastings prefers "considerateness" or "sweet reasonableness" (HDB, III, 413); "Gentleness and 'forbearance' are too passive. The 'considerateness' of the Bible, whether applied to God or man, is an active virtue. It is the Spirit of the Messiah Himself, who will not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax, and it is the spirit of every follower who realizes that 'the Lord is at hand.'" The want of this "considerateness" too often mars our religious life and spoils its influence.

MODERATION, mod-ēr-ā'shun (τὸ ἐπιεικές, to epieikēs): The word occurs once in AV, Phil 4 5.

MODIN, mō'din (Μωδέειν, Mōdēein, Μωδέειν, Mōdēein, Μωδέειν, Mōdēcin, and other forms; in the Talm it is called מוֹדְרִימ, mōdh'rim, and מוֹדְרִיית, mōdh'riith [Neubauer, Géographie du Talm, 99]): This place owes its interest to the part it played in the history of the Maccabees. It was the ancestral home of their family (1 Macc 2 17-70). Hither Mattathias, a priest of the sons of Joarib, retired when he had seen with a burning heart "the blasphemies that were committed in Judah and in Jerus" under the orders of Antiochus Epiphanes. But the king's officer followed him, and by offers of the king's friendship and great rewards sought to seduce the people into idolatry. This only fed the indignation of Mattathias, and when a Jew went forward to sacrifice, Mattathias slew him on the altar together with the king's officer. From such a step there could be no going back. Thus began the patriotic enterprise which, led by the old priest's heroic sons, was destined to make illustrious the closing days of the nation's life (1 Macc 2 1 ff; Ant, VI, 1, 2; BJ, I, i, 3). Mattathias, his wife and sons were all buried in Modin (1 Macc 2 70; 9 19; 13 25-30; Ant, XII, xi, 2; XIII, vi, 6). Near Modin Judas pitched his camp, whence issuing by night with the watchword "Victory is God's," he and a chosen band of warriors overwhelmed the army of Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc 13 14). In Modin Judas and John, the sons of Simon, slept before the battle in which they defeated Cendebeaus (1 Macc 16 4).

Of the impressive monument erected by Simon over the tombs of his parents and brethren Stanley (Hist of the Jewish Church, III, 318) gives the following account: "It was a square structure surrounded by colonnades of monolith pillars, of which the front and back were of white polished stone. Seven pyramids were erected by Simon on the summit, for the father and mother and four brothers who now lay there, with the seventh for himself when his time should come. On the faces of the monuments were bas-reliefs, representing the accoutrements of sword and spear and shield 'for an eternal memorial' of their many battles. There were also sculptures of ships—no doubt to record their interest in that long seaboard of the Phil coast, which they were the first to use for their country's good. A monument at once so Jewish in idea and so gentle in execution was worthy of the combination of patriotic fervor and high philosophic enlargement of soul which raised the Maccabean heroes so high above their age." Guérin (La Samarie, II, 401; Galilée, I, 47) thought he had discovered the remains of this monument at Khurbet el-Gharbāwi near Medyeh, in 1870. In this, however, he was mistaken, the remains being of Christian origin.

Various identifications have been proposed. Šōbā, about 6 miles W. of Jerus, was for a time generally accepted. Robinson (BR, III, 151 f) suggested Lātrūn. There is now a consensus of opinion in favor of el-Medyeh, a village to the E. of Wādy Mulaki, 13 miles W. of Bethel. It occupies a strong position in the hills 6 miles E. of Lydda, thus meeting the condition of Onom which places it near Lydda. The identification was suggested by Dr. Sandreczki of Jerus in 1869. From el-Medyeh itself the sea is not visible; but to the S. rises a rocky height, er-Rās, which commands a wide view, including the plain and the sea. The latter is 16 miles distant. If the monument of Simon stood on er-Rās, which from the rock cuttings seems not improbable, it would be seen very clearly by overlooking from the sea, esp. toward sunset (1 Macc 13 29). About ¼ mile W. of el-Medyeh are tombs known as Kubūr el-Yehūd, one bearing the name of Sheikh el-Gharbāwi, whose name attaches to the ruins. This is the tomb referred to above.

MOETH, mō'eth (Μωέθ, Mōēth): Called "son of Sabannus," one of the Levites to whom, with the priest Mermoth, the silver and gold brought by Ezra from Babylon were committed (1 Esd 8 63) = "Noadiah" of Ezr 8 33, but there styled "son of Binnui."

MOLADAH, mol'a-da, mō-lā'da (מֹלָדָה, mō-lādhāh; מוֹלָדָה, Mōlādā): A place in the far south (Negebh) of Judah, toward Edom (Josh 15 26), reckoned to Simeon (19 2; 1 Ch 4 28). It was repopled after the captivity (Neh 11 26). It is mentioned always in close proximity to Beersheba. Moladah is probably identical with Malatha, a city in Idumaea to which Agrippa at one time withdrew himself (Jos, Ant, XVIII, vi, 2). The site of this latter city has by Robinson and others been considered to be the ruins and wells of Tell el-Milh, some 13 miles to the E. of Beersheba and some 7 miles S.W. of Arad. The chief difficulty is the statement of Eusebius and Jerome that Malatha was "by Jattir," i.e. 'Attir; if this is correct the Tell el-Mülh is impossible, as it is 10 miles from 'Attir, and we have no light at all on the site. See SALT, CITY OF. For Tell el-Mülh see PEF, III, 415-16, Sh XXV. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MOLE, mōl ([1] מוֹלֵה, tinshemeth, AV "mole," RV "chameleon"; LXX ἀσπάλαξ, aspálax=σπάλαξ, spálat, "mole," Vulg talpa, "mole" [Lev 11 30]; [2] חֹלֶדֶת, hōledh, EV "weasel"; LXX γαλή, galē, "weasel" or "pole-cat"; cf Arab. خُلْد, khuld, "mole-rat" [Lev 11 29]; [3] חֲפָרֹת, hāphar-pērōth, EV "moles"; from חָפַר, hāphar, "to dig"; cf Arab. حَفَرَ, hafar, "to dig," and פָּרָה, pērāh, "mole" or "rat," for פָּאָרָה, p'ērāh, from √ פָּאָר, pā'ar, "to dig"; cf Arab. فَارَ, fa'rat, or فَارَة, fārat, "rat," "mouse," from √ فָر, fa'ar, "to dig"; LXX τοῖς ματαίοις, tois mataíois, "vain, idle, or profane persons" [Isa 2 20]: (1) Tinshemeth is the last of 8 unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11 29-30. The word occurs also in Lev 11 in 18 and Dt 14 16, tr<sup>d</sup> AV "swan," RV "horned owl," LXX πορφυράν, porphuriōn, "coot" or "heron." See CHAMELEON. (2) Hōledh is the first in the same list. The word occurs nowhere else, and is tr<sup>d</sup> "weasel" in EV, but comparison with the Arab. khuld has led to the suggestion that "mole-rat" would be a better tr. See WEASEL. (3) In Isa 2 20, "In that day men shall cast away their idols . . . to the moles and to the bats," hāphar-pērōth, variously written as one word or two, is tr<sup>d</sup> "moles" in EV, but has given rise to much conjecture.

The European "mole," Talpa europaea, is extensively distributed in the temperate parts of Europe and Asia, but is absent from Syria and Pal, its place being taken by the mole-rat, Spalax typhlus. The true mole belongs to the Insectivora, and feeds on earth-worms and insect larvae, but in making its tunnels and nests, it incidentally injures gardens and lawns. The mole-rat belongs to the Rodentia, and has teeth of the same general type as those of a rat or squirrel, large, chisel-shaped incisors behind which is a large vacant space, no canines, and praemolars and molars with grinding surfaces. It is larger than the mole, but of the same color, and, like the mole, is blind. It makes tunnels much like those of the mole. It is herbivorous and has been observed to seize growing plants and draw them down into its hole. In one of its burrows a central chamber has been found filled with entire plants of the hummus or chick-pea, and two side chambers containing pods plucked from the plants in the central chamber. While the mole digs with its powerful and peculiarly shaped front feet, the mole-rat digs with its nose, its feet being normal in shape. See LIZARD. ALFRED ÉLY DAY

MOLECH, mō'lek, MOLOCH, mō'lok (מֹלֶכֶת, ha-mōlekh, always with the art., except in 1 K 11 7; LXX ὁ Μολόχ, ho Molóch, sometimes also Μολχόμ, Molchóm, Μελχόλ, Melchól; Vulg Moloch):

1. The Name
  2. The Worship in OT History
  3. The Worship in the Prophets
  4. Nature of the Worship
  5. Origin and Extent of the Worship
- LITERATURE

The name of a heathen divinity whose worship figures largely in the later history of the kingdom of Judah. As the national god of the Ammonites, he is known as "Milcom" (1 K 11 5.7), or "Malcam" ("Malcan" is an alternative reading in 2 S 12 30.31; cf Jer 49 1.3; Zeph 1 5, where RVm reads "their king"). The use of βασιλεῖς, basileús, and ἀρχων, árchōn, as a tr of the name by the LXX suggests that it may have

1. The Name been originally the Heb word for "king," melekh. Molech is obtained from melekh by the substitution of the vowel points of Heb bōsheth, signifying "shame." From the obscure and difficult passage, Am 5 26, RV has removed "your Moloch" and given "your king," but LXX had here tr<sup>d</sup> "Moloch," and from the LXX it found its way into the Acts (7 43), the only occurrence of the name in the NT.

In the Levitical ordinances delivered to the Israelites by Moses there are stern prohibitions of Molech-worship (Lev 18 21; 20 2-5). Parallel to these prohibitions, although the Worship in name of the god is not mentioned, OT History are those of the Deuteronomic Code where the abominations of the Canaanites are forbidden, and the burning of their sons and daughters in the fire (to Molech) is condemned as the climax of their wickedness (Dt 12 31; 18 10-13). The references to Malcam, and to David's causing the inhabitants of Rabbath Ammon to pass through the brick kiln (2 S 12 30.31), are not sufficiently clear to found upon, because of the uncertainty of the readings. Solomon, under the influence of his idolatrous wives, built high places for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, and for Milcom, the abomination of the children of Ammon. See CHEMOSH. Because of this apostasy it was intimated by the prophet Ahijah, that the kingdom was to be rent out of the hand of Solomon, and ten tribes given to Jeroboam (1 K 11 31-33). These high places survived to the time of Josiah, who, among his other works of religious reformation, destroyed and defiled them, filling their places with the bones of men (2 K 23 12-14). Molech-worship had evidently received a great impulse from Ahaz, who, like Ahab of Israel, was a supporter of foreign religions (2 K 16 12 ff). He also "made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the nations, whom Jeh cast out from before the children of Israel" (2 K 16 3). His grandson Manasseh, so far from following in the footsteps of his father Hezekiah, who had made great reforms in the worship, reared altars for Baal, and besides other abominations which he practised, made his son to pass through the fire (2 K 21 6). The chief site of this worship, of which Ahaz and Manasseh were the promoters, was Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom, or, as it is also called, the Valley of the Children, or of the Son of Hinnom, lying to the S W. of Jerus (see GEHENNA). Of Josiah's reformation it is said that "he defiled Topheth . . . that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech" (2 K 23 10).

Even Josiah's thorough reformation failed to extirpate the Molech-worship, and it revived and continued till the destruction of Jerus, as we learn from the prophets of the time. From the beginning, the prophets maintained against it a loud and persistent protest. The testimony of Amos (1 15; 5 26) is ambiguous, but most of the ancient VSS for mal'kām, "their king," in the former passage, read mil'kōm, the national god of Ammon (see Davidson, in loc.). Isaiah was acquainted with Topheth and its abominations (Isa 30 33; 57 5). Over against his beautiful and lofty description of spiritual religion, Micah sets the exaggerated zeal of those who ask in the spirit of the Molech-worshipper: "Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" (Mic 6 6 ff). That Molech-worship had increased in the interval may account for the frequency and the clearness of the references to it in the later Prophets. In Jer we find the passing of sons and daughters through the fire to Molech associated with the building of "the high places of Baal, which are in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom" (32 35; cf 7 31 ff; 19 5 ff). In his oracle against the children of Ammon, the same prophet, denouncing evil against their land, predicts (almost in the very words of Amos above) that Malcam shall go into captivity, his priests and his princes together (49 1.3). Ezekiel, speaking to the exiles in Babylon, refers to the practice of causing children to pass through the fire to heathen divinities as long established, and proclaims the wrath of God against it (Ezk 16 20 f; 20 26.31; 23 37). That this prophet regarded the practice as among the "statutes that were not good, and ordinances wherein they should not live" (20 25) given by God to His people, by way of deception and judicial punishment, as some hold, is highly improbable and inconsistent with the whole prophetic attitude toward it. Zephaniah, who prophesied to the men who saw the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah, denounces God's judgments upon the worshippers of false gods (Zeph 1 5 f). He does not directly charge his countrymen with having forsaken Jeh for Malcam, but blames them, because worshipping Him they also swear to Malcam, like those Assyrian colonists in Samaria who feared Jeh and served their own gods, or like those of whom Ezekiel elsewhere speaks who, the same day on which they had slain their children to their idols, entered the sanctuary of Jeh to profane it (Ezk 23 39). The captivity in Babylon put an end to Molech-worship, since it weaned the people from all their idolatries. We do not hear of it in the post-exilic Prophets, and, in the great historical psalm of Israel's rebelliousness and God's deliverances (Ps 106), it is only referred to in retrospect (vs 37.38).

When we come to consider the nature of this worship it is remarkable how few details are given regarding it in Scripture. The place

4. The Nature of the Worship of Hinnom where it was practised from the days of Ahaz and Manasseh was the Valley of Hinnom where there stood, a huge altar-pyre for the burning of the sacrificial victims. There is no evidence connecting the worship with the temple in Jerus. Ezekiel's vision of sun-worshippers in the temple is purely ideal (Ezk 8). A priesthood is spoken of as attached to the services (Jer 49 3; cf Zeph 1 4.5). The victims offered to the divinity were not burnt alive, but were killed as sacrifices, and then presented as burnt offerings. "To pass through the fire" has been taken to mean a lustration or purification of the child by fire, not involving death. But the prophets clearly speak of slaughter and sacrifice, and of high places built to burn the children in the fire as burnt offerings (Jer 19 5; Ezk 16 20.21).

The popular conception, molded for Eng. readers largely by Milton's "Moloch, horrid king" as described in Paradise Lost, Book I, is derived from the accounts given in late Lat and Gr writers, esp. the account which Diodorus Siculus gives in his History of the Carthaginian Kronos or Moloch. The image of Moloch was a human figure with a bull's head and outstretched arms, ready to receive the children destined for sacrifice. The image of metal was heated red hot by a fire kindled within, and the children laid on its arms rolled off into the fiery pit below. In order to drown the cries of the victims, flutes were played, and drums were beaten; and mothers stood by without tears or sobs, to give the impression of the voluntary character of the offering (see Rawlinson's Phoenicia, 113 f, for fuller details).

On the question of the origin of this worship there is great variety of views. Of a non-Sem origin there is no evidence; and there is no trace of human sacrifices in the old Bab religion. That it prevailed widely among Sem peoples is clear. While Milcom or Malcam is peculiarly the national god of the Ammonites, as is Chemosh of the Moabites, the name Molech or

5. Origin and Extent of the Worship Melech was recognized among the Phoenicians, the Philis, the Aramaeans, and other Sem peoples, as a name for the divinity they worshipped from a very early time. That it was common among the Canaanites when the Israelites entered the land is evident from the fact that it was among the abominations from which they were to keep themselves free. That it was identical at first with the worship of Jeh, or that the prophets and the best men of the nation ever regarded it as the national worship of Israel, is a modern theory which does not appear to the present writer to have been substantiated. It has been inferred from Abraham's readiness to offer up Isaac at the command of God, from the story of Jephthah and his daughter, and even from the sacrifice of Hiel the Bethelite (1 K 16 34), that human sacrifice to Jeh was an original custom in Israel, and that therefore the God of Israel was no other than Moloch, or at all events a deity of similar character. But these incidents are surely too slender a foundation to support such a theory. "The fundamental idea of the heathen rite was the same as that which lay at the foundation of Heb ordinance: the best to God; but by presenting to us this story of the offering of Isaac, and by presenting it in this precise form, the writer simply teaches the truth, taught by all the prophets, that to obey is better than sacrifice—in other words that the God worshipped in Abraham's time was a God who did not delight in destroying life, but in saving and sanctifying it" (Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 254). While there is no ground for identifying Jeh with Moloch, there are good grounds for seeing a community of origin between Moloch and Baal. The name, the worship, and the general characteristics are so similar that it is natural to assign them a common place of origin, in Phoenicia. The fact that Moloch-worship reached the climax of its abominable cruelty in the Phoen colonies of which Carthage was the center shows that it had found among that people a soil suited to its peculiar genius.

MOLI, mō'li. See MOOLI.

MOLID, mō'lid (מֹלִיד, mōlīd): A Judahite (1 Ch 2 29).

MOLLIFY, mol'i-fi (from מִלֵּךְ, rākhakh, "to be soft"): "To make soft," used in modern Eng. only figuratively, as "His anger was mollified." EV, however, uses the word lit. in its two occurrences: Isa 1 6, "wounds, and bruises . . . neither bound up, neither mollified with oil"; Wisd 16 12, "mollifying plaister." Neither occurrence of the word is changed by RV.

MOLOCH, mō'lok: A deity of the Ammonites, like the planet Saturn, a representative of the sun-god in the particular aspect of a god of time. See ASTROLOGY, 8; MOLECH.

MOLTEN, mōl't'n, IMAGE. See IMAGES.

MOLTEN SEA. See LAVER.

MOMDIS, mom'dis (A, Mopsets, Momdets, B, Mopsets, Momdets): One of those who had taken

"strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34) = "Maadai" in Ezr 10 34.

MOMENT, mō'ment (מִנְטָה, regha', "a wink"; ἄτομος, átomos, "an atom"; στιγμή, stigmē, "a point"; παραντίκα, parantika, "immediately," "forthwith"): "Moment" is not used in Scripture for a division of time, but for an instant of time, as the wink or twinkling of the eye (Ex 33 5; Nu 16 21. 45; Lam 4 6; 1 Cor 15 52), or for a short period of time (Job 20 5; Ps 30 5; Isa 26 20; 2 Cor 4 17). The division of the hour into sixty minutes was certainly known in Babylonia, and the Jews were made acquainted with it, at least during the captivity, but they do not seem to have adopted it very extensively. MONEY, mun'i: Various terms are used for money in the Bible, but the most common are the Heb כֶּסֶף, kešeph, and Gr ἀργύριον, argýrion, both meaning silver. We find also כֶּסֶתֶה, k'sitáh, rendered by LXX "lambs," probably referring to money in a particular form; χαλκός, chalkós, is used for money in Mt 10 9; Mk 6 8; 12 41. It was the name of a small coin of Agrippa II (Madden, Coins of the Jews); χρῆμα, chrēma, "price," is rendered money in Acts 4 37; 8 18.20; 24 26; κέρμα, kérma, "piece," i.e. piece of money (Jn 2 15); δίδραχμον, dídrachmon, "tribute money" (Mt 17 24 AV, RV "half-shekel"); κῆνσος, kēnsos, "census," "tribute money" (Mt 22 19).

Gold and silver were the common medium of exchange in Syria and Pal in the earliest times of which we have any historical record.

1. Material and Form The period of mere barter had passed before Abraham. The close connection of the country with the two great civilized centers of antiquity, Egypt and Babylonia, had led to the introduction of a currency for the purposes of trade. We have abundant evidence of the use of these metals in the Bib. records, and we know from the monuments that they were used as money before the time of Abraham. The patriarch came back from his visit to Egypt "rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen 13 2). There was no system of coinage, but they had these metals cast in a convenient form for use in exchange, such as bars or rings, the latter being a common form and often represented or mentioned on the monuments of Egypt. In Babylonia the more common form seems to have been the former, such as the bar, or wedge, that Achan found in the sack of Jericho (Josh 7 21). This might indicate that the pieces were too large for ordinary use, but we have indications of the use of small portions also (2 K 12 9; Job 42 11). But the pieces were not so accurately divided as to pass for money without weighing, as we see in the case of the transaction between Abraham and the children of Heth for the purchase of the field of Machpelah (Gen 23). This transaction indicates also the common use of silver as currency, for it was "current money with the merchant," and earlier than this we have mention of the use of silver by Abraham as money: "He that is born in thy house and he that is bought with thy money" (Gen 17 13).

Jewels of silver and gold were probably made to conform to the shekel weight, so that they might be used for money in case of necessity. Thus Abraham's servant gave to Rebecca a gold ring of half a shekel weight and bracelets of ten shekels weight (Gen 24 22). The bundles of money carried by the sons of Jacob to Egypt for the purchase of corn (Gen 42 35) were probably silver rings tied together in bundles. The Heb for "talent," kikkār, signifies something round or circular, suggesting a ring of this weight to be used as money. The ordinary term for money was kešeph, "silver," and this word preceded by a numeral always refers to money, either with or without "shekel," which we are probably to supply where it is not expressed after the numeral, at least wherever value is involved, as the shekel (shekel) was the standard of value as well as of weight (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). Thus the value of the field of Ephron was in shekels, as was also the estimation of offerings for sacred purposes (Lev 5 15; 27, passim). Solomon purchased chariots at 600 (shekels) each and horses at 150 (1 K 10 29). Large sums were expressed in talents, which were a multiple of the shekel. Thus Menahem gave Pul 1,000 talents of silver (2 K 15 19), which was made up by the exaction of 50 shekels from each rich man. Hezekiah paid the war indemnity to Sennacherib with 300 talents of silver and 30 of gold (2 K 18 14). The Assyrian account gives 800 talents of silver, and the discrepancy may not be an error in the Heb text, as some would explain it, but probably a different kind of talent (see Madden, Coins of the Jews, 4). Solomon's revenue is stated in talents (1 K 10 14), and the amount (666 of gold) indicates that money was abundant, for this was in addition to what he obtained from the vassal states and by trade. His partnership with the Phoenicians in commerce brought him large amounts of the precious metals, so that silver was said to have been as plentiful in Jerus as stones (1 K 10 27).

Besides the forms of rings and bars, in which the precious metals were cast for commercial use, some other forms were perhaps current. Thus the term k'sitáh has been referred to as used for money, and the LXX tr has "lambs." It is used in Gen 33 19; Josh 24 32; Job 42 11, and the LXX rendering is supposed to indicate a piece in the form of a lamb or stamped with a lamb, used at first as a weight, later the same weight of the precious metals being used for money. We are familiar with lion weights and weights in the form of bulls and geese from the monuments, and it would not be strange to find them in the form of sheep. K'sitáh is cognate with the Arab. kasat, which means "to divide exactly" or "justly," and the noun kist means "a portion" or "a measure."

Another word joined with silver in monetary use is 'āghorāh (אֶגְוֶרָה), the term being tr<sup>d</sup> "a piece of silver" in 1 S 2 36. 'Āghorāh is cognate with the Arab. ujrat (أَجْرَة), "a wage," and it would seem that the piece of silver in this passage might refer to the same usage.

Another word used in a similar way is raç, from rāçaç, "to break in pieces," hence raç is "a piece" or "fragment of silver" used as money. These terms were in use before the introduction of coined money and continued after coins became common.

After the exile we begin to find references to coined money. It was invented in Lydia or per-

2. Coined Money haps in Aegina. Herodotus assigns the invention to the Lydians (i.94). The earliest Lydian coins were struck by Gyges in the 7th cent. BC. These coins were of electrum and elliptical in form, smooth on the reverse but deeply stamped with incuse impressions on the obverse. They were called staters, but were of two standards; one for commercial use with the Babylonians, weighing about 164.4 grains, and the other of 224 grains (see Madden, op. cit.). Later, gold was coined, and, by the time of Croesus, gold and silver. The Persians adopted the Lydian type, and coined both gold and silver darics, the name being derived from Darius Hystaspis (521-485 BC) who is reputed to have introduced the system into his empire. But the staters of Lydia were current there under Cyrus (Madden, op. cit.), and it was perhaps with these that the Jews first became acquainted in Babylon. Ezra states (2 69) that "they [the Jews] gave after their ability into the treasury of the work three-score and one thousand darics [RV] of gold, and five thousand pounds of silver." The term here rendered "daric" is dark'mōnīm, and this word is used in three passages in Neh (7 70-72), and 'ādharkōnīm occurs in 1 Ch 29 7 and Ezr 8 27. Both are of the same origin as the Gr drachma, probably, though some derive both from Darius (a Phoen inscription from the Piraeus tells us that dark'mōn corresponds to drachma). At all events they refer to the gold coins which we know as darics. The weight of the daric was 130 grains, though double darics were struck.

Besides the gold daric there was a silver coin circulating in Persia that must have been known to the Jews. This was the siglos (σίγλος), supposed to be referred to in Neh 5 15, where it is tr'd "shekel." These were the so-called silver darics, 20 of which were equivalent to the gold daric. Besides these Persian coins the Jews must have used others derived from their intercourse with the Phoen cities, which were allowed to strike coins under the suzerainty of the Persians. These coins were of both silver and bronze, the suzerain not permitting them to coin gold. We have abundant examples of these coins and trade must have made them familiar to the Jews.

The issues of Aradus, Sidon and Tyre were esp. noteworthy, and were of various types and sizes suited to the commercial transactions of the Phoenicians. The Tyrian traders were established in Jerus as early as the time of Nehemiah (13 16), and their coins date back to about that period. Among the finest specimens we have of early coinage are the tetradrachms of Tyre and the double shekels or staters of Sidon. The latter represent the Pers king, on the obverse, as he rides in his chariot, driven by his charioteer and followed by an attendant. On the reverse is a Phoen galley. The weight of these coins is from 380 to 430 grains, and they are assigned to the 4th and 5th cents. BC. From Tyre we have a tetradrachm which corresponds to the shekel of the Phoen standard of about 220 grains, which represents, on the obverse, the god Melkarth, the Tyrian Hercules, riding on a sea-horse, and, beneath, a dolphin. The reverse bears an owl with the Egyp crook and a flail, symbols of Osiris. The early coins of Aradus bear, on the obverse, the head of Baal or Dagon, and on the reverse a galley, above which is the legend M.A.  $\chi\psi$  in Phoen letters followed by a date. The legend signifies "Melek Aradus," i.e. "king of Aradus."

When Alexander overthrew the Pers empire in 331 BC, a new coinage, on the Attic standard, was introduced, and the silver drachms and tetradrachms struck by him circulated in large numbers, as is attested by the large number of examples still in existence. After his death, these coins, the tetradrachms esp., continued to be struck in the provinces, with his name and type, in his honor. We have examples of these struck at Aradus, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus and Acre, bearing the mint marks of these towns. They bear on the obverse the head of Alexander as Hercules, and, on the reverse, Zeus seated on his throne holding an eagle in the extended right hand and a scepter in the left. The legend is  $\text{ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ}$ , BASILEŌS ALEXANDROU, or  $\text{ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ}$ , ALEXANDROU, only, with various symbols of the towns or districts where they were struck, together with mint marks.

The successors of Alexander established kingdoms with a coinage of their own, such as the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Syria, and these coins, as well as those of Alexander, circulated among the Jews. The Ptolemies of Egypt controlled Pal for about a century after Alexander, and struck coins, not only in Egypt, but in some of the Phoen towns, esp. at Acre, which was, from that time, known as Ptolemais. Their coins were based upon the Phoen standard. But the Seleucid kings of Syria had the most influence in Phoenicia and Pal, and their monetary issues are very various and widely distributed, bearing the names and types of the kings, and the symbols and mint marks of the different towns where they were struck, and are on the Alexandrine or Attic standard in contrast to those of the Ptolemies. They are both silver and bronze, gold being struck in the capital, Antioch, usually. The coins of Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, are esp. interesting on account of his connection with Jewish affairs. It was he who made the futile attempt to hellenize the Jews, which led to the revolt that resulted, under his successors, in the independence of the country of Syrian control, and the institution of a native coinage in the time of the Maccabees.

The struggle caused by the persecution of Antiochus commenced in 165 BC and continued more than 20 years. Judas, the son of Mattathias, defeated Antiochus, who died in 164, but the war was continued by his successors until dynastic dissensions among them led to treaties with the Jews to gain their support. At last Simon, who espoused the cause of Demetrius II, obtained from him, as a reward, the right to rule Judaea under the title of high priest, with practical independence, 142-143 BC. Later Antiochus VII, his successor, confirmed Simon in his position and added some privileges, and among them the right to coin money (138-139 BC). Both silver and bronze coins exist ascribed to Simon, but some numismatists have recently doubted this, and have assigned them to another Simon in the time of the first revolt of the Jews under the Romans. The coins in question are the shekels and half-shekels with the legends, in Heb, shekel yisrā'el and y'rūshālēm k'dhōshāh ("Jerusalem the holy"), bearing dates ranging from the 1st to the 5th year, as well as bronze pieces of the 4th (see illustrations).

The reason for denying the ascription of these coins to Simon the Maccabee is the difficulty in finding room for the years indicated in his reign which closed in 135 BC. He received the commission to coin in 139-138, which would allow only 4 years for his coinage, whereas we have coins of the 5th year. Moreover, no shekels and half-shekels of any of the Maccabees later than Simon have come to light, which is, at least, singular since we should have supposed that all would have coined them as long as they remained independent, esp. since they coined in bronze, examples of the latter being quite abundant. The fact also that they bore the title of king, while Simon was high priest only, would seem to have furnished an additional reason for claiming the prerogative of coinage in silver as well as bronze. But this argument is negative only, and such coins may have existed but have not come to light, and there are reasons which seem to the present writer sufficient to assign them to Simon the Maccabee. In the first place, the chronological difficulty is removed if we consider that Simon was practically independent for three or four years before he obtained the explicit commission to coin money. We learn from Jos (Ant., XIII, vi, 7) and from 1 Macc (13 41.42) that in the 170th year of the Seleucid era, that is, 143-142 BC, the Jews began to use the era of Simon in their contracts and public records. Now it would not have been strange if Simon, seeing the anarchy that prevailed in the kingdom of Syria, should have assumed some prerogatives of an independent ruler before they were distinctly granted to him, and among them that of coining money. If he had commenced in the latter part of 139 BC, he would have been able to strike coins of the 5th year before he died, and this would satisfy the conditions (see Madden's Jewish Coinage). There is a difficulty quite as great in attributing these coins to Simon of the first revolt under the Romans. That broke out in 66 AD, and was suppressed by the taking of Jerus in 70. This would allow a date of the 5th year, but it is hardly supposable that in the terrible distress and anarchy that prevailed in the city during that last year any silver coins would have been struck. There is another fact bearing upon this question which is worthy of notice. The coins of the first revolt bear personal appellations, such as "Eleazar the priest," and "Simon," while those assigned to Simon the Maccabee bear no personal designation whatever. This is significant, for it is not likely that Eleazar and Simon would have commenced coining silver shekels and half-shekels with their names inscribed upon them in the 1st year of their reign and then have omitted them on later issues. Another point which has some force is this: We find mention, in the NT, of money-changers in connection with the temple, whose business it was to change the current coin, which was Rom or Gr, and bore heathen types and legends, for Jewish coins, which the strict Pharisaic rules then in force required from worshippers paying money into the temple treasury. It is inferred that they could furnish the shekels and half-shekels required for the yearly dues from every adult male (cf Mt 17 24-27). Now the only shekels and half-shekels bearing Jewish emblems and legends, at that time, must have been those issued by the Maccabean princes, that is, such as we have under discussion. In view of these facts the Maccabean origin of these pieces seems probable.

The shekels under discussion have on one side a cup, or chalice (supposed to represent the pot of manna), with the legend in Heb around the margin, שקל ישראל, shekel yisrā'el, with a letter above the cup indicating the year of the reign. The reverse bears the sprig of a plant (conjectured to be Aaron's rod) having three buds or fruits, and on the margin the legend, ירושלים הקדושה, y'rūshālēm ha-k'dhōshāh, "Jerusalem the holy." The half-shekel has the same type, but the reverse bears the legend, חצי שקל, hācī shekel (half-shekel). The letters indicating the year have a ש (sh'nath, "year") prefixed, except for the first. This also omits the י from k'dhōshāh and the second י from y'rūshālēm. The term "holy" for Jerus is found in Isa 48 2 and other passages of the OT, and is still preserved in the Arab. kudus by which the city is known today in Syria.

Copper, or bronze, half- and quarter-shekels are also attributed to Simon, bearing date of the 4th year. The obverse of the half-shekel has two bundles of thick-leaved branches with a citron between, and on the reverse a palm tree with two baskets filled with fruit. The legend on the obverse is שנת ארבע חצי, sh'nath 'arba' hācī, "the fourth year a half," and on the reverse, לְנִצְחָת צִיּוֹן, li-gh-'ullath cīyōn, "the redemption of Zion." The quarter-shekel has a similar type, except that the obverse lacks the baskets and the reverse has the citron only. The legend has רְבִיעִי, rbhi'i, "quarter," instead of "half." Another type is a cup with a margin of jewels on the obverse and a single bunch of branches with two citrons on the reverse.

The palm is a very common type on the coins of Judaea and a very appropriate one, since it is grown there. Jericho was called the city of palms.

The branches of trees in bundles illustrate the custom of carrying branches at the Feast of Tabernacles and the erection of booths made of branches for use during this feast (see Lev 23 40). The baskets of fruit may refer to the offerings of first-fruits (Dt 26 2). One of the above series of coins published by Madden bears the countermark of an elephant, which was a symbol adopted by the Seleucid kings, and this is an evidence of its early date. But whatever doubts there may be as to the coins of Simon, there can be none as to those of his successor, John Hyrcanus, who reigned 135-106 BC, since they bear his name. They are all of bronze and bear the following legend with a great number of variations, יהוחנן הכהן הגדל ורחב, יהוחנן הכהן הגדל ורחב, "Johanan the high priest and senate of the Jews." The reverse has a two-branched cornucopia with a poppy head rising from the center. There is some doubt as to the meaning of the word hebher (חבר) in the above. It is commonly rendered "senate," taking it in the sense it seems to bear in Hos 6 9, "a company" or "band," here the company of elders representing the people. Judas Aristobulus (106-105 BC) issued similar coins with Heb legends, but with the accession of Alexander Jannaeus (105-78 BC) we find bilingual inscriptions on the coins, Heb and Gr. The obverse bears the words יהוחנן המלך, y'hōnāthān ha-melekh, "Jehonathan the king," and the reverse, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ, BASILEŪS ALEXANDROU, "King Alexander." Most of his coins, however, bear Heb inscriptions only. All are of copper or bronze, like those of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and are of the denomination known to us in the NT as "mites," weighing from 25 to 35 grains.

When the Romans took possession of Pal in 63 BC, the independent rule of the Hasmoneans came to an end, but Pompey confirmed John Hyrcanus as governor of Judaea under the title of high priest. Dissensions between him and other members of his family called for interference several times on the part of the Romans. Hyrcanus was again confirmed by Julius Caesar in 47 and continued in authority until 40. It is uncertain what coins he issued, but whatever they were, they bore the type found on those of Alexander Jannaeus. In 40 BC, the Parthians temporarily overthrew the Rom authority in Syria and Pal, and set Antigonos on the throne of the latter, and he reigned until 37. The coins he issued bore bilingual inscriptions like the bilinguals of Alexander. He calls himself Antigonos in Gr, and Mattathias in Heb, the type being a wreath on the obverse and a double cornucopia on the reverse, though some have it single. They are much heavier coins than the preceding issues. The legends are: obverse, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΑΝΤΙΓΟΝΟΥ, BASILEŪS ANTIGONOU, "of King Antigonos"; reverse, מַתְתִּיָּהוּ בֶן־הַיְהוּדִים, mattithyāh ha-kōhēn gādōl ha-y'h(ūdhīm), "Mattathias the high priest of the Jews."

The Hasmonean dynasty ended with Antigonos and that of the Herods followed. Herod the Great was the first to attain the title of king, and his coins are numerous and bear only Gr legends and are all of bronze. The earliest have the type of a helmet with cheek pieces on the obverse and the legend: ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΗΡΩΔΟΥ, BASILEŪS HRŌDOU, and in the field to the left Γ (year 3), and on the right the monogram †. The reverse has a Macedonian shield with rays. The coin here illustrated is another type: a rude tripod on the obverse, and a cross within a wreath on the reverse, the legend being the same as given above.

Herod Archelaus, who reigned from 4 BC to 6 AD, issued coins with the title of ethnarch, the only coins of Pal to bear this title. They are all of small size and some of them have the type of a galley, indicating his sovereignty over some of the coast cities, such as Caesarea and Joppa.

The coins of Herod Antipas (4 BC-40 AD) bear the title of tetrarch, many of them being struck at Tiberias, which he founded on the Sea of Galilee and named after the emperor Tiberius. The following is an example: obverse HP. TETP(H-PQΔΟΥ ΤΕΤΡΑΧΟΥ), HĒR. TETR(HĒRŌDOU TETRACHOU), with the type of a palm branch; reverse, ΤΙΒΕΡΙΑΣ, TIBERIAS, within a wreath.

Others have a palm tree entire with the date ΛΓ and ΛΔ: 33 and 34 of his reign, 29-30 AD. There are coins of Herod Philip, 4 BC-34 AD, though somewhat rare, but those of Agrippa, 37-44 AD, are numerous, considering the shortness of his reign. The most common type is a small coin ("mite") with an umbrella having a tassel-like border, on the obverse, and three ears of wheat on one stalk on the reverse. The legend reads: Basileōs Agrippa, and the date is LS (year 6). Larger coins of Agrippa bear the head of the emperor (Caligula or Claudius) with the title of Sebastōs (Augustus) in Gr.

Amicus Rufus, 13-14 AD.

Agrippa II was the last of the Herodian line to strike coins (48-100 AD). They were issued under Nero, whose head they sometimes bear with his name as well as that of Agrippa. They are all of the denomination of the mite (leptōn).

tus, Tiberius, Claudius and Nero. They are all small and bear on the obverse the legends: KAI-CAPOC (Caesar), or IOYΔIA (Julia), or the emperor's name joined with Caesar. The coins of the Jews struck during the first and second revolts, 66-70 AD, and 132-135 AD, have already been alluded to with the difficulty of distinguishing them, and some have been described. They all have the types common to the purely Jewish issues; the date palm, the vine, bunches of fruit, the laurel or olive wreath, the cup or chalice, the lyre and a temple with columns. Types of animals or men they regarded as forbidden by their law. Most of them are bronze, but some are silver shekels and half-shekels, dated in the 1st, 2d and 3d years, if we assign those of higher date to Simon the Maccabee. Those of the 1st year bear the name of Eleazar the priest, on the obverse, and on the reverse the date "first year of the redemption of Israel," שנה אחת לנאחלת ישראל, sh-nath 'ahath li-gh'e'ullath yisrā'el. Others bear the name of Simon and some that of "Simon N'si' Israel" ("Simon Prince of Israel"). The coins of the 2d and 3d years are rare. They have the type of the cup and vine leaf, or temple and lulabh. Those supposed to belong to the second revolt bear the name of Simon without N'si' Israel, and are therefore assigned to Simon Bar-Cochba. The example here given has the type of the temple on the obverse with what is thought to be a representation of the "beautiful gate," between the columns, and a star above. The name Simon is on the margin, the first two letters on the right of the temple and the others on the left. The legend of the reverse is: להרוע ירושלם, li-herūth yrūshālēm ("the deliverance of Jerus").

Some of the coins struck by the Romans to commemorate their victory over the Jews were struck in Pal and some at Rome, and all bear the head of the Rom emperor on the obverse, but the reverse often exhibits Judaea as a weeping captive woman, seated at the foot of a palm tree or of a Rom standard bearing a trophy. The legend is sometimes Judaea capta and sometimes Judaea devicta. The example given has the inscription in Gr: IOYΔΙΑΣ ΕΑΛΩΚΥΙΑΣ, IOUDIAS EALŌKUIAS, Judaea capta.

There are coins of Agrippa II (the "king Agrippa" of Acts 25, 26), struck in the reign of Vespasian, with his name and title on the obverse and with a deity on the reverse, holding ears of wheat in the right hand and a cornucopia in the left. The inscription reads:

denarii and tetradrachms, the former being about one-fourth the weight of the latter which were known as staters (Mt 17 27). The piece referred to was the amount of tribute for two persons, and as the amount paid by one was the half-shekel (ver 24), this piece must have been the equivalent of the shekel or tetradrachm.

MONEY-CHANGERS, chān'jērs (κολλυβιστής, kollubistēs, from κόλλυβος, kóllubos, "a small coin," so "a money-changer," or "banker" [Mt 21 12; Mk 11 15; "changers" in Jn 2 15; cf ver 14, where κερματιστής, kermatistēs, "a dealer in small bits," or "change," is also rendered "changers"]); cf τραπεζίτης, trapezitēs, "one who sits at a table," "a money-changer," "a banker" or "broker"; one who both exchanges money for a small fee and pays interest on deposits [Mt 25 27, AV "exchangers," ARV "bankers"]): The profession of money-changer in Pal was made necessary by the law requiring every male Israelite who had reached the age of 20 years to pay into the treasury of the sanctuary a half-shekel at every numbering of the people, an offering to Jeh, not even the poor being exempt. It seems to have become an annual tax, and was to be paid in the regular Jewish half-shekel (Ex 30 11-15). Since the Jews, coming up to the feasts, would need to exchange the various coins in common circulation for this Jewish piece, there were money-changers who exacted a premium for the exchange. This fee was a kollubos (about 31 cents in U.S. money), hence the name kollubistēs. The Jews of Christ's day came from many parts of the world, and the business of exchanging foreign coins for various purposes became a lucrative one, the exchangers exacting whatever fee they might. Because of their greed and impiety, Jesus drove them from the courts of the temple.

MONEY, CURRENT, kur'ent (עָבָר, 'ōbhēr, "passing," Gen 23 16; 2 K 12 4 [Heb 5]): The text and tr in 2 K 12 4 are uncertain and difficult. See RVm. The reference is probably not to a money standard, but to a poll tax which was levied in addition to the free-will offering. Gen 23 16 implies the existence of a standard shekel and also probably the use of the precious metals in stamped bars or ingots of an approximately fixed weight or value, a primitive coinage. CH presupposes these pieces, and records in cuneiform writing discovered in Cappadocia indicate that shekel pieces with a seal stamp were in use in Asia Minor in the time of Hammurabi (Sayce, Contemporary Review, August, 1907, XCII, 259 ff). The existence of these pieces did not do away with the custom of weighing money, a practice which obtained in Israel down to the time of the exile (Jer 32 10).

MONEY, LOVE OF (φιλαργυρία, philarguria, 1 Tim 6 10, lit. MONTH, munth (חֹדֶשׁ, hōdesh, יָרֵחַ, yerah; מֶנֶח, mēn): Hōdesh is strictly the "new moon," the appearance of which marked the beginning of the month, commonly indicated by rō'sh ha-hōdesh. Yerah is derived from yārēah, "moon," which comes from the vb. that means "to wander," "to make a circuit." Thus the month was lunar, the period of the moon's circuit. The Gr mēn also meant "moon," from the Sanskrit ma, "to measure," the Lat mensis and our "moon" being derived from the same root (see CALENDAR; TIME; ASTRONOMY).

Hōdesh, or rather rō'sh ha-hōdesh, was observed as a festival (1 S 20 5.18.24; Isa 1 14).

MOOLI, mō'ō-lī (A, Μοολί, Mooli, B, Μοολί, Moolēi; AV Moli): Son of Merari and grandson of Levi (1 Esd 8 47) = "Mahli" in Ezr 8 18 (see Ex 6 16.19).

MOON, mōōn (יָרֵחַ, yārēah; meaning obscure—probably "wanderer"; by some given as "pale-ness"; σελήνη, selēnē): The moon was very early worshipped by the nations of the Far East as a divinity or the representative of one or more deities. These deities were both masculine and feminine. In Assyria and Babylonia the most common name for the moon-god was Sin or Sen. In Babylonia he was also called Aku and Nannara. In Egypt the moon was representative of several deities, all masculine. The chief of these was Thoth the god of knowledge, so called because the moon was the measurer of time. Babylonia has, also, Aa, the goddess of the moon, as the consort of the sun, while her equivalent was known in Phoenicia as Ashtaroth-karnaim. This personification and worship of the moon among the nations who were neighbors to Pal was but part of an elaborate Nature-worship found among these people. Nor was this worship always separated from Pal by geographical lines. It crept into the thought and customs of the Hebrews and in a sense affected their religious conceptions and ceremonies. They fell into the habit of making direct homage to sun, moon and stars, as is evidenced by Job 31 26.27; Jer 44 17, and even Isa 3 18 (see CRESCENTS). Moses seems to have forewarned his people against the danger of this form of worship (Dt 4 19).

The actual worship of the moon and the idolatry consequent thereon seems to have touched the Hebrews, though this is disputed by some. It would seem difficult to explain 2 K 21 3 upon any other supposition, and in 2 K 23 4.5 we have a clear statement that Josiah put down the worship of the moon among the people and silenced the priests of this form of worship.

Certain forms of the adoration of the moon, or superstitious fear of baneful influences as coming from the moon, still abound in some sections of the world. In fact in nearly all sections modified forms of old superstitions still hold sway and yield but slowly to scientific knowledge.

The eclipses of the moon were naturally given a religious significance inasmuch as the Heb knowledge of them did not rise much above awe and wonder (Isa 13 10; Joel 2 31; Mt 24 29; Mk 13 24). Other passages causing interference with the constancy of the moon to foreshadow great events can be found in Jer 13 16; Ezk 32 7.8; Rev 8 12. An interesting passage and most difficult of interpretation is Rev 12 1. It is frequently interpreted as a revelation in symbolism of the glory of the church clothed with the light and radiating the truth of God. See also ASTRONOMY; ASTROLOGY.

MOOSSIAS, mō-os'i-as (B, Μοοσιᾶς, Moosēias, A, Μοός Σίας, Moós Sias; AV Moosias, mō-ō-sī'as): One of those who had taken a "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 31) = "Maaseiah" in Ezr 10 30.

MOPH, mof. See MEMPHIS.

MORALITY, mō-ral'i-ti. See ETHICS.

MORASHTITE, mō-rash'tit (מִרְשָׁתִּית, mōrash'tit; AV Morasthite, mō-ras'thīt): Gentile designation of the prophet Micah (Jer 26 18; Mic 1 1). See also MORESHETH-GATH.

MORDECAI, mōr'dē-kī, mōr-dē-kā'i (מֶרְדֳּכָי, mōr'dekhay; Μαρδοχαῖος, Mardochoaios): An Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin, whose fate it has been to occupy a distinguished place in the annals of his people. His great-grandfather, Kish, had been carried to Babylon along with Jeconiah, king of Judah (Est 2 5-6). For nearly 60 years before the scenes narrated in Est, in which Mordecai was greatly concerned, took place, the way to Pal had been open to the Israelites; but neither his father, Jair, nor afterward himself chose to return to the ancient heritage. This seems to have been the case also with the rest of his house, as it was with the vast majority of the Israelitish people; for his uncle died in Persia leaving his motherless daughter, Hadassah, to the care of Mordecai. Employed in the royal palace at Susa, he attracted, through the timely discovery of a plot to assassinate the king, the favorable notice of Xerxes, and in a short time became the grand vizier of the Pers empire. He has been believed by many to have been the author of the Book of Est; and in the earliest known notice of the Feast of Purim, outside of the book just mentioned, that festival is closely associated with his name. It is called "the day of Mordecai" (2 Macc 15 36). The apocryphal additions to Est expatiate upon his greatness, and are eloquent of the deep impression which his personality and power had made upon the Jewish people. Lord Arthur Hervey has suggested the identification of Mordecai with Matacas, or Natacas, the powerful favorite and minister of Xerxes who is spoken of by Ctesias, the Gr historian. Few have done more to earn a nation's lasting gratitude than Mordecai, to whom, under God, the Jewish people owe their preservation. JOHN URQUHART

MOREH, mō're, HILL OF (הַבְּרֵכָה הַמִּדְיָנִית, gibb'ath ha-mōreh, "hill of the teacher"; B, Γαβα-θαμωρα, Gabaathamōrā, A, τοῦ βωμοῦ τοῦ Ἀβὶρ, toû bōmōu toû Abōr): The Heb mōreh is derived from the vb. yārāh, "to teach," "to direct," and indicates one who directs, or gives oracular answers. We might therefore read "hill of the teacher," the height being associated with such a person who had his seat here. The hill is named only in describing the position of the Midianites before Gideon's attack (Jgs 7 1). If the identification of the Well of Harod with 'Ain Jalūd is correct, Gideon must have occupied the slopes to the E. of Jezreel. The Midianite camp was in the valley of Jezreel (6 33). The Heb text in 7 1, which has probably suffered some corruption, seems to mean that the Midianites lay N. of the position held by Gideon, their lines running from the hill of Moreh in the plain. The hill can hardly have been other than Jebel ed-Duhy, often called Little Hermon, which rises boldly from the northern edge of the vale of Jezreel, with Shunem (Sōlam) lying at its western foot. Moore ("Judges," ICC, 200) would lay the scene in the neighborhood of Shechem, but there is no good reason to doubt the accuracy of the tradition which places it on the edge of the plain of Esdraelon. MOREH, OAK OF (אֵלֶךְ מִרְיָה, 'ēlōn mōreh, "terebinth of the teacher"; הָיָה דְרֹמֶן הָיָה שְׁמֵהּ, tēn drūn tēn hupsēlēn; AV Plain of Moreh): It seems probable that the place here intended may be the same as that mentioned in Dt 11 30 ('ēlōnē mōreh, "terebinths of Moreh," AV "plains," RV "oaks," RVm "terebinths"). Both are defined as near to Shechem. The position cannot be identified today. The tree or trees were evidently a place of resort for those who wished to consult a mōreh. See MOREH, HILL OF. To this day in Pal trees are often regarded with a certain religious awe as the habitation of spirits. Isolated terebinths receive much veneration. The present writer has often seen such trees with multitudinous rags of all colors attached to them by the peasantry as evidence of their homage. See MEONENIM.

MORESHETH-GATH, mō'resh-eth-gath, mō-res'h-eth-gath (מִירוֹשֶׁת גֹּת, mōresheth gath, "inheritance or possession of Gath"; LXX κληρονομία Γέθ, klēronomias Gēth): A place mentioned only in Mic

1 14. It must have been in the vicinity of Gath as the meaning of the name would indicate, and was the home of the prophet Micah (Mic 1 1; Jer 26 18). It was probably in the vicinity of Mareshah (Mic 1 15). Jerome, in his preface to his work on Micah, places it a little to the E. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), and it would be natural to find it there if the latter place was Gath as some think. Robinson (BR, II, 68) found ruins of a village between one and two miles E. of Beit Jibrin. It must have been among the foot-hills of Judah between the hill country and the Phili plain on the route from Jerus to Lachish, Gaza and Egypt. Mareshah was certainly in that region, and the prophecy of Micah mentions towns and villages in the Shephelah and the Phili country as though they were familiar to him (see HGH and G. A. Smith, "Micah," in his Minor Prophets).

MORIAH, mō-rī'a, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ הַמֹּרְיָה, 'ereṣ ha-mōr'yāh; εἰς τὴν γῆν τὴν ὑψηλὴν, eis tēn gēn tēn hupsēlēn): Abraham was directed by God to take his son Isaac, to go into the land of Moriah, and there to offer him for a burnt offering (Gen 22 2) upon a mountain which God would show him. This land is mentioned only here, and there is little to guide us in trying to identify it. A late writer (2 Ch 3 1) applies the name of Moriah to the mount on which Solomon's Temple was built, possibly associating it with the sacrifice of Isaac. A similar association with this mountain may have been in the mind of the writer of Gen 22 (see ver 14), who, of course, wrote long after the events described (Driver). But in ver 2 no special mountain is indicated.

Abraham journeyed from the land of the Philis, and on the 3d day he saw the place afar off (ver 4). This naturally suggests some prominent mountain farther N. than Jerus. The description could hardly apply to Jerus in any case, as it could not be seen "afar off" by one approaching either from the S. or the W. The Samaritans lay the scene of sacrifice on Mt. GERIZIM (q.v.).

Instead of "Moriah" in this passage Pesh reads "Amorites." This suggests a possible emendation of the text, which, if it be accepted, furnishes a more definite idea of the land within which that memorable scene was enacted. Both Jerus and Gerizim, however, lay within the boundaries of the land of the Amorites. No doubt the enmity existing between the Jews and the Samaritans led them each to glorify their own holy places to the detriment of those of their rivals. Little stress can therefore be laid upon their identifications. With our present knowledge we must be content to leave the question open. W. EWING

MORNING, mōr'ning: There are several Heb and Gr words which are rendered "morning," the most common in Heb being בֹּקֶר, bōker, which occurs 180 t. It properly means "the breaking forth of the light," "the dawn," as in Gen 19 27; Jgs 19 8.25.27. Another word with the same meaning is שָׁחַר, shaḥar (Gen 19 15; Neh 4 21; Isa 58 8). מִשְׁחָר, mishḥar ("womb of the m.," Ps 110 3) is a poetical term derived from the same root. See HIND OF THE MORNING. נֹגְהָא, nōghā, נִגְהָא, naghhā (Dnl 6 19 [Heb 20]), mean "brightness." הַשְׁכֵּם, hashkēm, comes from הִשְׁכִּים, hish-kīm, "to load an animal" (for a journey), and as the nomads are accustomed to do this early in the morning it came to mean early morning (1 S 17 16). See BETIMES.

In the NT δῆμος, ōrthros, is properly "dawn," and is used for early morning (Jn 8 2; Acts 5 21), and πρωτα, prōta, signifies the same (Mt 27 1). πρωτ, prōt, "early," is an advb. and means early in the m. (Mk 1 35). M. as an adj. is ὀρθρινός, orthrinós (Rev 22 16), or πρωινός, prōinós (1 Esd 1 11; 5 50; Rev 2 28; 22 16).

MORNING WATCH (אֶשְׁמֶרֶת הַבֹּקֶר, 'ash-mōreth ha-bōker [Ex 14 24; 1 S 11 11]; in Jth 12 5 for heōthinhē phulakē; cf Sir 55 6; 1 Macc 5 30): The last portion of the night (see WATCH).

MORNING, WINGS OF. See ASTRONOMY, I, 4.

MORROW, mor'ō, TOMORROW, tōd-mor'ō: Two words are used in the OT in this meaning: בֹּקֶר, bōker, which properly means "dawn," or "morning," and מָחָר, māhār, properly the same, but used for the next morning and hence "tomorrow," like the Ger. morgen. The derivative מָחָרָה, mōhārāh, is "the following day," "all the next day," esp. after yōm ("day"), but usually coupled with a noun following, as in Lev 23 11, mōhārāh ha-shabbāth, "day after the Sabbath." It is also used adverbially for "on the morrow," as in Gen 19 34.

In the Gr of the NT we find αύριον, aurion (Mt 6 34, etc), commonly used, but ἐξῆς, hezēs, also occurs (Acts 25 17 AV, where RV renders more exactly "the next day"); ἐπαύριον, epaurion, is "on the morrow" (Acts 10 9.23.24).

MORROW AFTER THE SABBATH (מָחָרָה אַחֲרֵי הַשַּׁבָּת, mōhārāh, or מָחָרָה אַחֲרֵי הַשַּׁבָּת, mōhārāhām, "the morrow," or "tomorrow," "the day following"; מָחָרָה אַחֲרֵי הַשַּׁבָּת, mōhārāh ha-shabbāth, "the day after the Sabbath," i.e. the first day of the week): The first day of the week was designated for the formal offering of the first-fruits in the form of wave-sheaves (Lev 23 11), and of the wave-loaves 50 days later (Lev 23 16.17). This recognition of an after-Sabbath during festive periods has its counterpart in the later ecclesiastical practice of celebrating not only Easter Sunday, but also Easter Monday, etc, and undoubtedly was a factor in establishing the custom which transferred the sanctity of the Sabbath to the first day of the week after the resurrection of Our Lord.
FRANK E. HIRSCH

MORSEL, mōr'sel (σπῆσις, brōsis): Found only in He 12 16 AV, "For one morsel of meat [RV "mess of meat"] sold his birthright," lit. "for one eating," i.e. one meal. The Great Bible (Cranmer's) has "for one mease of meat."

MORTAL, mōr'tal, MORTALITY, mor-tal'i-ti (θνητός, thnētós, τὸ θνητόν, tó thnētón): The meaning is "subject to death" (Rom 6 12; 8 11; 1 Cor 15 53.54; in 2 Cor 5 4 RV has "what is mortal"). In Job 4 17, the Heb word is 'ēnōsh, "mortal man." See IMMORTAL.

MORTAR, mōr'tēr (מִדְּכָה, m'dhōkhāh [Nu 11 8], מִכְרֵשׁ, makhlēsh [Prov 27 22]): A hollowed stone or vessel in which grain or other substance was pounded or beaten with a pestle. The Israelites used a mortar in which to beat the manna in the wilderness (Nu 11 8), and Prov 27 22 declares, "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar with a pestle . . . yet will not his foolishness depart from him," i.e. it is inherent and ineradicable. Some have supposed an allusion to an oriental mode of punishment by pounding the criminal to death in a mortar, but this is unlikely. In illustration of Prov 27 22 such proverbs are quoted as "Though you beat that loose woman in a mortar, she will not leave her ways." See also BRAY. For "mortar" (AV "morter") see BITUMEN.
JAMES ORR

MORTGAGE, mōr'gāj (מִרְבָּה, 'ārābh): To give or be security as a part of bartering, give pledges, become surety. In time of great need for food, "Some also there were that said, We are mortgaging [AV "have mortgaged"] our fields," etc (Neh 5 3). See SURETY.

MORTIFY, mōr'ti-fi (Rom 8 13 AV and ERV, θανάτω, thanatō, ERV "make to die," and Col 3 5, νεκρώ, nekrō, ERV "make dead"): This sense of mortify is obsolete in modern Eng., and ARV in both places substitutes "put to death," with great advantage. The context in both passages goes to the heart of St. Paul's doctrine of the union of the believer with Christ. This union has given the soul a new life, flowing (through the Spirit) from Christ in the heavenly world, so that the remnants of the old corrupt life-principle are now dangerous excrescences. Hence they are to be destroyed, just as a surgeon removes the remnants of a diseased condition after the reestablishment of healthy circulation. The interpreter must guard against weakening St. Paul's language into some such phrase as "subdue all that is inconsistent with the highest ideals," for St. Paul views the union with Christ as an intensely real, quasi-physical relation.
BURTON SCOTT EASTON

MOSERAH, mō-sē'ra, mō-sē-rā (מוֹסֶרֶה, mō-sērāh, "bond"): Perhaps Moser with Hē locale, "to Moser" (Dt 10 6). See MOSEROTH.

MOSEROTH, mō-sē'roth, mō'sē-roth, -rōth (מוֹסֶרֶת, mōsērōth, "bonds"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Hashmonah and Bene-jaakan (Nu 33 30.31). It is probably the same as Moserah (Dt 10 6), though in that passage the name follows Bene-jaakan. There Aaron died and was buried. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MOSES, mō'zez, mō'ziz (מֹשֶׁה, mōsheh; Egyp mēs, "drawn out," "born"; LXX Μωυσή[s], Mōusē[s]): The great Heb national hero, leader, author, lawgiver and prophet.

LITERATURE

The traditional view of the Jewish church and of the Christian church, that M. was a person and that the narrative with which his life-story is interwoven is real history, is in the main sustained by commentators and critics of all classes.

It is needless to mention the old writers among whom these questions were hardly under discussion. Among the advocates of the current radical criticism may be mentioned Stade and Renan, who minimize the historicity of the Bible narrative at this point. Renan thinks the narrative "may be very probable." Ewald, Wellhausen, Robertson Smith, and Driver, while finding many flaws in the story, make much generally of the historicity of the narrative.

The critical analysis of the Pent divides this life-story of M. into three main parts, J, E, and P, with a fourth, D, made up mainly from the others. Also some small portions here and there are given to R, esp. the account of Aaron's part in the plagues of Egypt, where his presence in a J-document is very troublesome for the analytical theory. It is unnecessary to encumber this biography with constant cross-references to the strange story of M. pieced together out of the rearranged fragments into which the critical analysis of the Pent breaks up the narrative. It is recognized that there are difficulties in the story of M. In what ancient life-story are there not difficulties? If we can conceive of the ancients being obliged to ponder over a modern life-story, we can easily believe that they would have still more difficulty with it. But it seems to very many that the critical analysis creates more difficulties in the narrative than it relieves. It is a little thing to explain by such analysis some apparent discrepancy between two laws or two events or two similar incidents which we do not clearly understand. It is a far greater thing so to confuse, by rearranging, a beautiful, well-articulated biography that it becomes disconnected—indeed, in parts, scarcely makes sense.

The biographical narrative of the Heb national hero, M., is a continuous thread of history in the Pent. That story in all its simplicity and symmetry, but with acknowledgment of its difficulties as they arise, is here to be followed.

1. Life.—The recorded story of Moses' life falls naturally into five rather unequal parts: "And there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi" (Ex 2 1). The son of Levi born of that union became the greatest man among mere men in the whole history of the world. How far he was removed in genealogy from Levi it is impossible to know.

The genealogical lists (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16-20; Nu 3 14-28; 26 57-59; 1 Ch 6 1-3) show only 4 generations from Levi to M., while the account given of the numbers of Israel at the exodus (Ex 12 37; 26 28; Nu 1 46; 11 21) imperatively demand at least 10 or 12 generations. The males alone of the sons of Kohath "from a month old and upward" numbered at Sinai 8,600 (Nu 3 27-28). It is evident that the extract from the genealogy here, as in many other places (1 Ch 23 15f; 26 24; Ezr 7 1-5; 8 1,2; cf 1 Ch 6 3-14; Mt 1 1-17; Lk 3 23-38) is not complete, but follows the common method of giving important heads of families. The statement concerning Jochebed: "And she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister" (Nu 26 59) really creates no difficulty, as it is likewise said of Zilpah, after the mention of her grandsons, "And these she bare unto Jacob" (Gen 46 17,18; cf 46 24,25).

The names of the immediate father and mother of M. are not certainly known. The mother "saw him that he was a goodly child" (Ex 2 2). So they defied the commandment of the king (Ex 1 22), and for 3 months hid him instead of throwing him into the river.

The time soon came when it was impossible longer to hide the child (Jos, Ant, II, ix, 3-6).

The mother resolved upon a plan which was at once a pathetic imitation of obedience to the commandment of the king, an adroit appeal to womanly sympathy, and, if it succeeded, a subtle scheme to bring the cruelty of the king home to his own attention. Her faith succeeded. She took an ark of bulrushes (Ex 2 3,4; cf ARK OF BULRUSHES), daubed it with bitumen mixed with the sticky slime of the river, placed in this floating vessel the child of her love and faith, and put it into the river at a place among the sedge in the shallow water where the royal ladies from the palace would be likely to come down to bathe. A sister, probably Miriam, stood afar off to watch (Ex 2 3,4). The daughter of Pharaoh came down with her great ladies to the river (Ex 2 5-10). The princess saw the ark among the sedge and sent a maid to fetch it. The expectation of the mother was not disappointed. The womanly sympathy of the princess was touched. She resolved to save this child by adopting him. Through the intervention of the watching sister, he was given to his own mother to be nursed (Ex 2 7-9). "And the child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son" (Ex 2 10). Thus he would receive her family name.

Royal family names in Egypt then were usually compounded of some expression of reverence or faith or submission and the name of a god, e.g. "loved of," "chosen of," "born of," Thoth, Ptah, Ra or Amon. At this period of Egypt history, "born of" (Egypt mes, "drawn out") was joined sometimes to Ah, the name of the moon-god, making Ahmes, or Thoth, the scribe-god, so Thothmes, but usually with Ra, the sun-god, giving Rames, usually anglicized Rameses or Ramesses.

It was the time of the Ramesside dynasty, and the king on the throne was Rameses II. Thus the founding adopted by Pharaoh's daughter would have the family name Mes or Moses. That it would be joined in the Egypt to the name of the sun-god Ra is practically certain. His name at court would be Ramesses. But to the oriental mind a name must mean something. The usual meaning of this royal name was that the child was "born of" a princess through the intervention of the god Ra. But this child was not "born of" the princess, so falling back upon the primary meaning of the word, "drawn out," she said, "because I drew him out of the water" (Ex 2 10). Thus Moses received his name. Pharaoh's daughter may have been the eldest daughter of Rameses II, but more probably was the daughter and eldest child of Seti Merenptah I, and sister of the king on the throne. She would be lineal heir to the crown but debarred by her sex. Instead, she bore the title "Pharaoh's Daughter," and, according to Egypt custom, retained the right to the crown for her first-born son. A not improbable tradition (Jos, Ant, II, ix, 7) relates that she had no natural son, and Moses thus became heir to the throne, not with the right to supplant the reigning Pharaoh, but to supersede any of his sons.

Very little is known of Moses' youth and early manhood at the court of Pharaoh. He would certainly be educated as a prince, whose right it probably was to be initiated into the mysteries. Thus he was "instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7 22), included in which, according to many Egyptologists, was the doctrine of one Supreme God.

Many curious things, whose value is doubtful, are told of M. by Jos and other ancient writers (Jos, Ant, II, ix, 3; xi; Cap, I, 31; cf DB; for Mohammedan legends, see Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus, Appendix; for rabbinical legends, see Jew Enc). Some of these traditions are not incredible but lack authentication. Others are absurd. Egyptologists have searched with very indifferent success for some notice of the great Hebrew at the Egypt court.

But the faith of which the Ep. to the He speaks (He 11 23-28) was at work. Moses "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter" (Ex 2 11-14; Acts 7 24). Whether he did so in word, by definite renunciation, or by his espousal of the cause of the slave against the oppressive policy of Pharaoh is of little importance. In either case he became practically a traitor, and greatly imperiled his throne rights and probably his civil rights as well. During some intervention to ameliorate the condition of the state slaves, an altercation arose and he slew an Egyptian (Ex 2 11,12). Thus his constructive treason became an overt act. Discovering through the ungrateful reproaches of his own kinsmen (Acts 7 25) that his act was known, he quickly made decision, "choosing rather to share ill treatment with the people of God," casting in his lot with slaves of the empire, rather than "to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season," amid the riotous living of the young princes at the Egypt court; "accounting the reproach of Christ" his humiliation, being accounted a nobody ("Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?") as "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt" (He 11 25,26; Acts 7 25-28). He thought to be a nobody and do right better than to be a tyrant and rule Egypt.

M. fled, "not fearing the wrath of the king" (He 11 27), not cringing before it or submitting to it, but defying it and braving all that it could bring upon him, degradation from his high position, deprivation of the privileges and comforts of the Egypt court. He went out a poor wanderer (Ex

2 15). We are told nothing of the escape and the journey, how he eluded the vigilance of the court guards and of the frontier-line of sentinels. The friend of slaves is strangely safe while within their territory. At last he reached the Sinaitic province of the empire and hid himself away among its mountain fastnesses (Ex 2 15). The romance of the well and the shepherdesses and the grateful father and the future wife is all quite in accord with the simplicity of desert life (Ex 2 16-22). The "Egyptian" saw the rude, selfish herdsmen of the desert imposing upon the helpless shepherd girls, and, partly by the authority of a manly man, partly, doubtless, by the authority of his Egypt appearance in an age when "Egypt" was a word with which to frighten men in all that part of the world, he compelled them to give way. The "Egyptian" was called, thanked, given a home and eventually a wife. There in Midian, while the anguish of Israel continued under the taskmaster's lash, and the weakening of Israel's strength by the destruction of the male children went on, with what more or less rigor we know not, M. was left by Providence to mellow and mature, that the haughty, impetuous prince, "instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," might be transformed into the wise, well-poised, masterful leader, statesman, lawgiver, poet and prophet. God usually prepares His great ones in the countryside or about some of the quiet places of earth, farthest away from the busy haunts of men and nearest to the "secret place of the Most High." David keeping his father's flocks, Elijah on the mountain slopes of Gilead, the Baptist in the wilderness of Judaea, Jesus in the shop of a Galilean carpenter; so M. a shepherd in the Bedouin country, in the "waste, howling wilderness."

(1) The commission.—One day Moses led the flocks to "the back of the wilderness" (Ex 3 1-12; see BURNING BUSH). M. received his commission, the most appalling commission ever given to a mere man (Ex 3 10)—a commission to a solitary man, and he a refugee—to go back home and deliver his kinsmen from a dreadful slavery at the hand of the most powerful nation on earth. Let not those who halt and stumble over the little difficulties of most ordinary lives think hardly of the faltering of Moses' faith before such a task (Ex 3 11-13; 4 1.10-13). "Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex 3 14), was the encouragement God gave him. He gave him also Aaron for a spokesman (Ex 4 14-16), the return to the Mount of God as a sign (Ex 3 12), and the rod of power for working wonders (Ex 4 17).

One of the curious necessities into which the critical analysis drives its advocates is the opinion concerning Aaron that "he scarcely seems to have been a brother and almost equal partner of Moses, perhaps not even a priest" (Bennett, HDB, III, 441). Interesting and curious speculations have been instituted concerning the way in which Israel and esp. Pharaoh were to understand the message, "I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex 3 13.14; cf 6 3). They were evidently expected to understand this message. Were they to do so by translating or by transliterating it into Egyptian? Some day Egyptologists may be able to answer positively, but not yet.

With the signs for identification (Ex 4 1-10), M. was ready for his mission. He went down from the "holy ground" to obey the high summons and fulfil the great commission (Ex 4 18-23). After the perplexing controversy with his wife, a controversy of stormy ending (Ex 4 24-26), he seems to have left his family to his father-in-law's care while he went to respond to the call of God (Ex 18 6). He met Aaron, his brother, at the Mount of God (Ex 4 27.28), and together they returned to Egypt to collect the elders of Israel (Ex 4 29-31), who were easily won over to the scheme of emancipa-tion. Was ever a slave people not ready to listen to plans for freedom?

(2) The conflict with Pharaoh.—The next move was the bold request to the king to allow the people to go into the wilderness to hold a feast unto Jeh (Ex 5 1). How did Moses gain admittance past the jealous guards of an Egypt court to the presence of the Pharaoh himself? And why was not the former traitorous refugee at once arrested? Egyptology affords a not too distinct answer. Rameses II was dead (Ex 4 19); Merenptah II was on the throne with an insecure tenure, for the times were troublous. Did some remember the "son of Pharaoh's daughter" who, had he remained loyal, would have been the Pharaoh? Probably so. Thus he would gain admittance, and thus, too, in the precarious condition of the throne, it might well not be safe to molest him. The original form of the request made to the king, with some slight modification, was continued throughout (Ex 8 27; 10 9), though God promised that the Egyptians should thrust them out altogether when the end should come, and it was so (Ex 11 1; 12 31.33.39). Yet Pharaoh remembered the form of their request and bestirred himself when it was reported that they had indeed gone "from serving" them (Ex 14 5). The request for temporary departure upon which the contest was made put Pharaoh's call to duty in the easiest form and thus, also, his obstinacy appears as the greater heinousness. Then came the challenge of Pharaoh in his contemptuous demand, "Who is Jeh?" (Ex 5 2), and Moses' prompt acceptance of the challenge, in the beginning of the long series of plagues (see PLAGUES) (Ex 8 1 ff; 12 29-36; 14 31; cf Lamb, Miracle of Science). Pharaoh, having made the issue, was justly required to afford full presentation of it. So Pharaoh's heart was "hardened" (Ex 4 21; 7 3.13; 9 12.35; 10 1; 14 8; see PLAGUES) until the vindication of Jeh as God of all the earth was complete. This proving of Jeh was so conducted that the gods of Egypt were shown to be of no avail against Him, but that He is God of all the earth, and until the faith of the people of Israel was confirmed (Ex 14 31).

(3) Institution of the Passover.—It was now time for the next step in revelation (Ex 12; 13 1-16). At the burning bush God had declared His purpose to be a saviour, not a destroyer. In this contest in Egypt, His absolute sovereignty was being established; and now the method of deliverance by Him, that He might not be a destroyer, was to be revealed. M. called together the elders (Ex 12 21-28) and instituted the Passover feast. As God always in revelation chooses the known and the familiar—the tree, the bow, circumcision, baptism, and the Supper—by which to convey the unknown, so the Passover was a combination of the household feast with the widespread idea of safety through blood-sacrifice, which, however it may have come into the world, was not new at that time. Some think there is evidence of an old Sem festival at that season which was utilized for the institution of the Passover.

The lamb was chosen and its use was kept up (Ex 12 3-6). On the appointed night it was killed and "roasted with fire" and eaten with bitter herbs (Ex 12 8), while they all stood ready girded, with their shoes on their feet and their staff in hand (Ex 12 11). They ate in safety and in hope, because the blood of the lamb was on the door (Ex 12 23). That night the firstborn of Egypt were slain. Among the Egyptians "there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Ex 12 30), from the house of the maid-servant, who sat with her handmill before her, to the palace of the king that "sat on the throne," and even among the cattle in the pasture

If the plague was employed as the agency of the angel of Jeh, as some think, its peculiarity is that it takes the strongest and the best and culminates in one great stunning blow and then immediately subsides (see PLAGUES). Who can tell the horror of that night when the Israelites were thrust out of the terror-stricken land (Ex 12 39)?

As they went out, they "asked," after the fashion of departing servants in the East, and God gave them favor in the sight of the over-awed Egyptians that they lavished gifts upon them in extravagance. Thus "they despoiled the Egyptians" (Ex 12 36). "Moreover the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people" (Ex 11 3; 12 35-36).

(4) The exodus.—"At the end of 430 years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the hosts of Jeh went out from the land of Egypt" (Ex 12 41). The great oppressor was Rameses II, and the culmination and the revolution came, most probably, in connection with the building of Pithom and Raameses, as these are the works of Israel mentioned in the Bible narrative (Ex 1 11). Rameses said that he built Pithom at the "mouth of the east" (Budge, Hist of Exodus, V, 123). All efforts to overthrow that statement have failed and for the present, at least, it must stand. Israel built Pithom, Rameses built Pithom; there is a synchronism that cannot in the present knowledge of Egypt history even be doubted, much less separated. The troublous times which came to Egypt with the beginning of the reign of Merenptah II afforded the psychological moment for the return of the "son of Pharaoh's daughter" and his access to the royal court. The presence and power of Jeh vindicated His claim to be the Lord of all the earth, and Merenptah let the children of Israel go.

A little later when Israel turned back from the border of Khar (Pal) into the wilderness and disappeared, and Merenptah's affairs were somewhat settled in the empire, he set up the usual boastful tablet claiming as his own many of the victories of his royal ancestors, added a few which he himself could truly boast, and inserted, near the end, an exultation over Israel's discomfiture, accounting himself as having finally won the victory:

"Asgalon led out, taken with Gezer, Yenoamam made naught;

"The People of Israel is ruined, his posterity is not; Khar is become as the widows of Egypt."

The synchronisms of this period are well established and must stand until, if it should ever be, other facts of Egypt history shall be obtained to change them. Yet it is impossible to determine with certainty the precise event from which the descent into Egypt should be reckoned, or to fix the date BC of M., Rameses and Merenptah, and the building of Pithom, and so, likewise, the date of the exodus and of all the patriarchal movements. The ancients were more concerned about the order of events, their perspective and their synchronisms than about any epochal date. For the present we must be content with these chronological uncertainties. Astronomical science may sometimes fix the epochal dates for these events; otherwise there is little likelihood that they will ever be known.

They went out from Succoth (Egyp "Thuku," Budge, History of Egypt, V, 122, 129), carrying the bones of Joseph with them as he had commanded (Ex 13 19; Gen 50 25). The northeast route was the direct way to the promised land, but it was guarded. Pithom itself was built at "the mouth of the East," as a part of the great frontier defences (Budge, op. cit., V, 123). The "wall" on this frontier was well guarded (Ex 14), and attempts might be made to stop them. So they went not "by the way of the land of the Philis . . . lest peradventure the people repent when they see war" (Ex 13 17). The Lord Himself took the leadership and went ahead of the host of Israel in a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex 13 21). He led them by "the way of the wilderness by the Red Sea" (Ex 13 18). They pitched before Pi-hahiroth, over against Baal-zephon between Migdol and the sea (Ex 14 2). Not one of these places has been positively identified. But the journeys before and after the crossing, the time, and the configuration of the land and the coast-line of the sea, together with all the necessities imposed by the narrative, are best met by a crossing near the modern town of Suez (Naville, Route of the Exodus; Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus), where Ras 'Ataka comes down to the sea, upon whose heights a mighdöl or "watch-tower," as the southern outpost of the eastern line of Egypt defences, would most probably be erected.

Word was carried from the frontier to Pharaoh, probably at Tanis, that the Israelites had "fled" (Ex 14 5), had taken the impassioned thrusting out by the frenzied people of Egypt in good faith and had gone never to return. Pharaoh took immediate steps to arrest and bring back the fugitives. The troops at hand (Ex 14 6) and the chariot corps, including 600 "chosen chariots," were sent at once in pursuit, Pharaoh going out in person at least to start the expedition (Ex 14 6.7). The Israelites seemed to be "entangled in the land," and, since "the wilderness [had] shut them in" (Ex 14 3), must easily fall a prey to the Egypt army. The Israelites, terror-stricken, cried to M. God answered and commanded the pillar of cloud to turn back from its place before the host of Israel and stand between them and the approaching Egyptians, so that while the Egyptians were in the darkness Israel had the light (Ex 14 19.20). The mountain came down on their right, the sea on the left to meet the foot of the mountain in front of them; the Egyptians were hastening on after them and the pillar of cloud and fire was their rearward. M. with the rod of God stood at the head of the fleeing host. Then God wrought. M. stretched out the rod of God over the sea and "Jeh caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all the night" (Ex 14 16-21). A pathway was before them and the sea on the right hand, and on the left was a "wall unto them," and they passed through (Ex 14 21.22). Such heaping up of the waters by the wind is well known and sometimes amounts to 7 or 8 ft. in Lake Erie (Wright, Scientific Confirmations of the OT, 106). No clearer statement could possibly be made of the means used and of the miraculous timing of God's providence with the obedience of the people to His command to M. The host of Israel passed over on the hard, sandy bottom of the sea. The Egyptians coming up in the dark and finding it impossible to tell exactly where the coast-line had been on this beach, and where the point of safety would lie when the wind should abate and the tide come in again, impetuously rushed on after the fleeing slaves. In the morning, Jeh looked forth and troubled the Egyptians "and took off their chariot wheels, and they drove them heavily" (Ex 14 24.25). The wind had abated, the tide was returning and the infiltration that goes before the tide made the beach like a quicksand. The Egyptians found that they had gone too far and tried to escape (Ex 14 27), but it was too late. The rushing tide caught them (Ex 14 28). When the day had come, "horse and rider" were but the subject of a minstrel's song of triumph (Ex 15 1-19; Ps 106 9-12) which Miriam led with her timbrel (Ex 15 20). The Bible does not say, and there is no reason to believe, that Pharaoh led the Egypt hosts in person further than at the setting off and for the giving of general direction to the campaign (Ex 15 4). Pharaoh and his host were overthrown in the Red Sea (Ps 136 15). So Napoleon and his host were overthrown at Waterloo, but Napoleon lived to die at St. Helena. And Merenptah lived to erect his boastful inscription concerning the failure of Israel, when turned back from Kadesh-barnea, and their disappearance in the wilderness of Paran. His mummy, identified by the lamented Professor Groff, lies among the royal mummies in the Cairo Museum. Thus at the Red Sea was wrought the final victory of Jeh over Pharaoh; and the people believed (Ex 14 31).

(5) Special providences.—Now proceeded that long course of special providences, miraculous timing of events, and multiplying of natural agencies which began with the crossing of the Red Sea and ended only when they "did eat of the fruit of the land" (Josh 5 12). God promised freedom from the diseases of the Egyptians (Ex 15 26) at the bitter waters of Marah, on the condition of obedience. M. was directed to a tree, the wood of which should counteract the alkaline character of the water (Ex 15 23-25). A little later they were at Elim (Wādī Gharandel, in present-day geography), where were "twelve springs of water and three score and ten palm trees" (Ex 15 27). The enumeration of the trees signifies nothing but their scarcity, and is understood by everyone who has traveled in that desert and counted, again and again, every little clump of trees that has appeared. The course of least resistance here is to turn a little to the right and come out again at the Red Sea in order to pass around the point of the plateau into the wilderness of Sin. This is the course travel takes now, and it took the same course then (Ex 16 1). Here Israel murmured (Ex 16 2), and every traveler who crosses this blistering, dusty, wearisome, hungry wilderness joins in the murmuring, and wishes, at least a little, that he had stayed in the land of Egypt (Ex 16 3). Provisions brought from Egypt were about exhausted and the land supplied but little. Judging from the complaints of the people about the barrenness of the land, it was not much different then from what it is now (Nu 20 1-6). Now special providential provision began. "At even . . . the quails came up, and covered the camp," and in the morning, after the dew, the manna was found (Ex 16 4-36; see MANNA; QUAILS).

At Rephidim was the first of the instances when Moses was called upon to help the people to some water. He smote the rock with the rod of God, and there came forth an abundant supply of water (Ex 17 1-6). There is plenty of water in the wady near this point now. The Amalekites, considering the events immediately following, had probably shut the Israelites off from the springs, so God opened some hidden source in the mountain side. "Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel" (Ex 17 8). Whether the hand which M. lifted up during the battle was his own hand or a symbolical hand (Ex 17 9-12), thought to have been carried in battle then, as sometimes even yet by the Bedouin, is of no importance. It was in either case a hand stretched up to God in prayer and allegiance, and the battle with Amalek, then as now, fluctuates according as the hand is lifted up or lowered (Ex 17 8-16).

Here Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, met him and brought his wife and children to him (Ex 18 5,6; cf Nu 10 29). A sacrificial feast was held with the distinguished guest (Ex 18 7-12). In the wise counsel of this great desert-priest we see one of the many natural sources of supply for Moses' legal lore and statesmanship. A suggestion of Jethro gave rise to one of the wisest and most far-reaching elements in the civil institutions of Israel, the elaborate system of civil courts (Ex 18 13-26).

(6) Receiving the Law.—At Sinai M. reached the pinnacle of his career, though perhaps not the pinnacle of his faith. (For a discussion of the location of Sinai, see SINAI; EXODUS.) It is useless to speculate about the nature of the flames in the theophany by fire at Sinai. Some say there was a thunderstorm (HDB); others think a volcanic eruption. The time, the stages of the journey, the description of the way, the topography of this place, esp. its admirable adaptability to be the cathedral of Jeh upon earth, and, above all, the collocation of all the events of the narrative along this route to this spot and to no other—all these exercise an overwhelming influence upon one (cf Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus). If they do not conclusively prove, they convincingly persuade, that here the greatest event between Creation and Calvary took place.

Here the people assembled. "And Mount Sinai, the whole of it, smoked," and above appeared the glory of God. Bounds were set about the mountain to keep the people back (Ex 19 12,13). God was upon the mountain: "Under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the very heaven for clearness" (Ex 19 16-19; 24 10, 16,17), "and God spake all these words" (Ex 20 1-17). Back over the summit of the plain between these two mountain ridges in front, the people fled in terror to the place "afar off" (Ex 20 18), and somewhere about the foot of this mountain a little later the tabernacle of grace was set up (Ex 40 17). At this place the affairs of M. mounted up to such a pinnacle of greatness in the religious history of the world as none other among men has attained unto. He gave formal announcement of the perfect law of God as a rule of life, and the redeeming mercy of God as the hope through repentance for a world of sinners that "fall short." Other men have sought God and taught men to seek God, some by the works of the Law and some by the way of propitiation, but where else in the history of the world has any one man caught sight of both great truths and given them out?

M. gathered the people together to make the covenant (Ex 24 1-8), and the nobles of Israel ate a covenant meal there before God (Ex 24 11). God called M. again to the mountain with the elders of Israel (Ex 24 12). There M. was with God, fasting 40 days (Ex 34 28). Joshua probably accompanied M. into the mount (Ex 24 13). There God gave directions concerning the plan of the tabernacle: "See . . . that thou make all things according to the pattern that was showed thee in the mount" (He 8 5-12, summing up Ex 25 40; 26 30; 27 8). This was the statement of the architect to the builder. We can only learn what the pattern was by studying the tabernacle (see TABERNACLE). It was an Egypt plan (cf Bible Student, January, 1902). While M. was engaged in his study of the things of the tabernacle on the mount, the people grew restless and appealed to Aaron (Ex 32 1). In weakness Aaron yielded to them and made them a golden calf and they said, "These are thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (32 2-6; cf CALF, GOLDEN). This was probably, like the later calf-worship at Bethel and Dan, ancient Sem bull-worship and a violation of the second commandment (20 5; cf Bible Student, August, 1902). The judgment of God was swift and terrible (32 7-35), and Levi was made the Divine agent (32 25-29). Here first the "tent of meeting" comes into prominence as the official headquarters of the leader of Israel (33 7-11). Henceforth independent and distinct from the tabernacle, though on account of the similarity of names liable to be confused with that building, it holds its place and purpose all through the wanderings to the plain of Moab by Jordan (Dt 31 14). M. is given a vision of God to strengthen his own faith (Ex 33 12-23; 34 1-35). On his return from communion with God, he had such glory within that it shone out through his face to the terror of the multitude, an adumbration of that other and more glorious transfiguration at which M. should also appear, and that reflection of it which is sometimes seen in the life of many godly persons (Mt 17 1-13; Mk 9 2-10; Lk 9 28-36).

Rationalistic attempts to account for the phenomena at Sinai have been frequent, but usually along certain lines. The favorite hypothesis is that of volcanic action. God has often used natural agencies in His revelation and in His miracles, and there is no necessary obstacle to His doing so here. But there are two seemingly insuperable difficulties in the way of this naturalistic explanation: one, that since geologic time this has not been a volcanic region; the other, that volcanic eruptions are not conducive to literary inspiration. It is almost impossible to get a sane account from the beholders of an eruption, much less has it a tendency to result in the greatest literature, the most perfect code of laws and the profoundest statesmanship in the world. The human mind can easily believe that God could so speak from Sinai and direct the preparation of such works of wisdom as the Book of the Covenant. Not many will be able to think that M. could do so during a volcanic eruption at Sinai. For it must be kept in mind that the historical character of the narrative at this point, and the Mosaic authorship of the Book of the Covenant, are generally admitted by those who put forward this naturalistic explanation.

(7) Uncertainties of history.—From this time on to the end of Moses' life, the materials are scant, there are long stretches of silence, and a biographer may well hesitate. The tabernacle was set up at the foot of the "mountain of the law" (Ex 40 17-19), and the world from that day to this has been able to find a mercy-seat at the foot of the mountain of the law. Nadab and Abihu presumptuously offered strange fire and were smitten (Lev 10 1-7). The people were numbered (Nu 1 1 ff). The Pass-over was kept (Nu 9 1-5).

(8) Journey to Canaan resumed.—The journey to Canaan began again (Nu 10 11-13). From this time until near the close of the life of M. the events associated with his name belong for the most part to the story of the wanderings in the wilderness and other subjects, rather than to a biography of M. (cf WANDERINGS; AARON; MIRIAM; JOSHUA; CALEB; BRAZEN SERPENT, etc). The subjects and references are as follows:

(13) Moses' final acts.—M. was now ready for the final instruction of the people. They were assembled and a great farewell address was given (Dt 1-30 20). Joshua was formally inducted into office (Dt 31 1-8), and to the priests was delivered a written copy of this last announcement of the Law now adapted to the progress made during 40 years (Dt 31 9-13; cf 31 24-29). M. then called

Joshua into the tabernacle for a final charge (Dt 31 14-23), gave to the assembled elders of the people "the words of this song" (Dt 31 30; 32 1-43) and blessed the people (Dt 33). And then M., who "by faith" had triumphed in Egypt, had been the great revelator at Sinai, had turned back to walk with the people of little faith for 40 years, reached the greatest triumph of his faith, when, from the top of Nebo, the towering pinnacle of Pisgah, he lifted up his eyes to the goodly land of promise and gave way to Joshua to lead the people in (Dt 34). And there M. died and was buried, "but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day" (Dt 34 5.6), "and Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died" (Dt 34 7).

This biography of M. is the binding-thread of the Pent from the beginning of Ex to the end of Dt, without disastrous breaks or disturbing repetitions. There are, indeed, silences, but they occur where nothing great or important in the narrative is to be expected. And there are, in the eyes of some, repetitions, so-called doublets, but they do not seem to be any more real than may be expected in any biography that is only incidental to the main purpose of the writer. No man can break apart this narrative of the books without putting into confusion this life-story; the one cannot be treated as independent of the other; any more than the narrative of the Eng. Commonwealth and the story of Cromwell, or the story of the American Revolution and the career of Washington.

Later references to M. as leader, lawgiver and prophet run all through the Bible; only the most important will be mentioned: Josh 8 30-35; 24 5; 1 S 12 6-8; 1 Ch 23 14-17; Ps 77 20; 99 6; 105; 106; Isa 63 11.12; Jer 15 1; Dnl 9 11-13; Hos 12 13; Mic 6 4; Mal 4 4.

The place held by M. in the NT is as unique as in the OT, though far less prominent. Indeed, he holds the same place, though presented in a different light. In the OT he is the type of the Prophet to be raised up "like unto" him. It is the time of types, and M., the type, is most conspicuous. In the NT the Prophet "like unto Moses" has come. He now stands out the greatest One in human history, while M., the type, fades away in the shadow. It is thus he appears in Christ's remarkable reference to him: "He wrote of me" (Jn 5 46). The principal thing which M. wrote specifically of Christ is this passage: "Jeh thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me" (Dt 18 15.18 f). Again in the Ep. to the He, which is the formal passing over from the types of the OT to the fulfilment in the NT, Jesus is made to stand out as the Moses of the new dispensation (He 3; 12 24-29). Other most important NT references to M. are Mt 17 3; Mk 9 4; Lk 9 30; Jn 1 17.45; 3 14; Rom 5 14; Jude ver 9; Rev 15 3.

II. Work and Character.—So little is known of the private life of M. that his personal character can scarcely be separated from the part which he bore in public affairs. It is the work he wrought for Israel and for mankind which fixes his place among the great ones of earth. The life which we have just sketched as the life of the leader of Israel is also the life of the author, the lawgiver, and the prophet.

It is not within the province of this art. to discuss in full the great critical controversies concerning the authorship of M. which have been summed up against him thus: "It is doubtful whether we can regard M. as an author in the literary sense" (HDB, III, 446; see PENTATEUCH; DEUTERONOMY). It will only be in place here to present a brief statement of the evidence in the case for M. There is no longer any question concerning the literary character of the age in which M. lived. That M. might have written is indisputable. But did he write, and how much? What evidence bears at these points?

(1) "Moses wrote."—The idea of writing or of writings is found 60 t in the Pent. It is definitely recorded in writing purporting to be by M. 7 t that M. wrote or was commanded to write (Ex 17 14; 34 27; 39 30; Nu 17 2,3; Dt 10 4; 31 24) and frequently of others in his times (Dt 6 9; 27 3; 31 19; Josh 8 32). Joshua at the great convocation at Shechem for the taking of the covenant wrote "these words in the book of the law of God" (Josh 24 26). Thus is declared the existence of such a book but 25 years after the death of M. (cf Bible Student, 1901, 269-74). It is thus clearly asserted by the Scriptures as a fact that M. in the wilderness a little after the exodus was "writing" "books."

(2) Moses' library.—There are many library marks in the Pent, even in those portions which by nearly all, even the most radical, critics are allowed to be probably the writings of M. The Pent as a whole has such library marks all over it.

On the one hand this is entirely consistent with the known literary character of the age in which M. lived. One who was "instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" might have had in his possession Egypt records. And the author of this art. is of that class to whom Professor Clay refers, who believe "that Hebraic (or Amoraic) literature, as well as Aramaic, has a great antiquity prior to the 1st millennium BC" (Clay, Amurru, 32).

On the other hand, the use of a library to the extent indicated by the abiding marks upon the Pent does not in the least militate against the claim of M. for authorship of the same. The real library marks, aside from the passages which are assigned by the critics to go with them, are far less numerous and narrower in scope than in Gibbon or in Kurtz. The use of a library no more necessarily endangers authorship in the one case than in the other.

(3) The Moses-tradition.—A tradition from the beginning universally held, and for a long time and without inherent absurdity, has very great weight. Such has been the M.-tradition of authorship. Since M. is believed to have been such a person living in such an age and under such circumstances as might suitably provide the situation and the occasion for such historical records, so that common sense does not question whether he could have written "a" Pent, but only whether he did write "the" Pent which we have, it is easier to believe the tradition concerning his authorship than to believe that such a tradition arose with nothing so known concerning his ability and circumstances. But such a tradition did arise concerning M. It existed in the days of Josiah. Without it, by no possibility could the people have been persuaded to receive with authority a book purporting to be by him. The question of the truthfulness of the claim of actually finding the Book of the Law altogether aside, there must have been such a national hero as M. known to the people and believed in by them, as well as a confident belief in an age of literature reaching back to his days, else the Book of the Law would not have been received by the people as from M. Archaeology does not supply actual literary material from Israel much earlier than the time of Josiah, but the material shows a method of writing and a literary advancement of the people which reaches far back for its origin, and which goes far to justify the tradition in Josiah's day. Moreover, to the present time, there is no archaeological evidence to cast doubt upon that tradition.

(4) The Pent in the Northern Kingdom.—The evidence of the Pent in the Northern Kingdom before the fall of Samaria is very strong—this entirely aside from any evidence from the Sam Pent. Although some few insist upon an early date for that book, it is better to omit it altogether from this argument, as the time of its composition is not absolutely known and is probably not very far from the close of the Bab exile of Judah. But the prophets supply indubitable evidence of the Pent in the Northern Kingdom (Hos 1 10; 4 6; 8 1,13; 9 11; 12 9; Am 5 21,22; 8 5; cf Green, Higher Criticism and the Pent, 56-58).

(5) Evidence for the Mosaic age.—Beyond the limit to which historical evidence reaches concerning the Mosaic authorship of the Pent, internal evidence for the Mosaic age as the time of its composition carries us back to the very days of M. Egypt words in the Pent attest its composition in the Mosaic age, not because they are Egypt words, for it is quite supposable that later authors might have known Egypt words, but because they are Egypt words of such marked peculiarities in meaning and history and of such absolutely accurate use in the Pent, that their employment by later authors in such a way is incredible. The list of such words is a long one. Only a few can be mentioned here. For a complete list the authorities cited must be consulted. There is יְרֵאֵר, ye'er, for the streams of Egypt; אֲהֵא, ahēa, for the marshy pasture lands along the Nile; שֶׁשֶׁח, shēsh, for the "fine white linen" of the priests; "the land of Rameses" for a local district in lower Egypt; צַפְנַת פַּאֲנָח, ṣāphēnath pa-nāḥ, Joseph's Egypt name, and אֲגַנָּח, ag-nath, the name of Joseph's Egypt wife, and many other Egypt words (see Lieblein, in PSBA, May, 1898, 202-10; also The Bible Student, 1901, 36-40).

(6) The obscurity of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Pent.—This obscurity has been urged against the Mosaic authorship of the Pent. Because of the popular belief concerning the doctrine of the resurrection among the Egyptians, this objection to the Mosaic authorship of the Pent becomes the most forcible of all the objections urged by critics. If the Pent was written by M. when Israel had just come out of Egypt, why did he leave the doctrine of the resurrection in such obscurity? The answer is very simple. The so-called Egypt doctrine of the resurrection was not a doctrine of resurrection at all, but a doctrine of resuscitation. The essential idea of resurrection, as it runs through Scripture from the first glimpse of it until the declaration of Paul: "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. If there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body" (1 Cor 15 35-45), is almost absolutely beyond the Egypt vision of the future life. With the Egyptians the risen body was to live the same old life on "oxen, geese, bread, beer, wine and all good things" (cf for abundant illustration Maspero's Guide to Cairo Museum). The omission of the doctrine of the resurrection from the Pent at the later date assigned by criticism is very hard to account for. In view of some passages from the Ps and the Prophets, it appears inexplicable (Job 19 25-27; Ps 16 10; 49 15; Isa 26 19; Ezk 37; Dnl 12 2). The gross materialism of the Egypt doctrine of the rising from the dead makes the obscurity of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Pent in Moses' day perfectly natural. Any direct mention of the subject at that time among a people just come out of Egypt would have carried at once into Israel's religion the materialism of the Egypt conception of the future life. The only way by which the people could be weaned away from these Egypt ideas was by beginning, as the Pent does, with more spiritual ideas of God, of the other world and of worship. The obscurity of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Pent, so far from being against the Mosaic authorship, is a very cogent reason for believing the Pent to have come from that age, as the only known time when such an omission is reasonably explicable. Lord, in his lectures, though not an Egyptologist, caught sight of this truth which later work of Egyptologists has made clear (Moses, 45). Warburton had a less clear vision of it (see Divine Legation).

(7) The unity of the Pent.—Unity in the Pent, abstractly considered, cannot be indicative of a particular time for its composition. Manifestly, unity can be given a book at any time. There is indisputably a certain appearance of unity in narrative in the Pent, and when this unity is examined somewhat carefully, it is found to have such peculiarity as does point to the Mosaic age for authorship. The making of books which have running through them such a narrative as is contained in the Pent which, esp. from the end of Gen. is entangled and interwoven with dates and routes and topographical notes, the history of experiences, all so accurately given that in large part to this day the route and the places intended can be identified, all this, no matter when the books were written, certainly calls for special conditions of authorship. A narrative which so provides for all the exigencies of desert life and so anticipates the life to which Israel looked forward, exhibits a realism which calls for very special familiarity with all the circumstances. And when the narrative adds to all this the life of a man without breaks or repetitions adverse to the purpose of a biography, and running through from beginning to end, and not a haphazard, unsymmetrical man such as might result from the piecing together of fragments, but a colossal and symmetrical man, the foremost man of the world until a greater than M. should appear, it demands to be written near the time and place of the events narrated. That a work of fiction, struck off at one time by one hand, might meet all these requirements at a later date, no one can doubt, but a scrap-book, even though made up of facts, cannot do so. In fact, the scraps culled out by the analysis of the Pent do not make a connected life-story at all, but three fragmentary and disconnected stories, and turn a biography, which is the binding-thread of the books, into what is little better than nonsense.

The unity of the Law, which also can be well sustained, is to the same effect as the unity of the narrative in certifying the narrative near to the time and place of the events narrated. The discussion of the unity of the Law, which involves nearly the whole critical controversy of the day, would be too much of a digression for an article on M. (see LAW; LEVITICUS; DEUTERONOMY; also Green, Higher Criticism and the Pent; Orr, POT; Wiener, Bib. Sac., 1909-10).

Neither criticism nor archaeology has yet produced the kind or degree of evidence which rationalism demands for the Mosaic authorship of the Pent. No trace has yet been found either of the broken tablets at Mt. Sinai or of the autograph copy of the Law of the Lord "by the hand of Moses" brought out of the house of the Lord in the days of Josiah. Nor are these things likely to be found, nor anything else that will certify authorship like a transcription of the records in the copyright office. Such evidence is not reasonably demanded. The foregoing indications point very strongly to the production of the Pent in the Mosaic age by someone as familiar with the circumstances and as near the heart of the nation as M. was. That here and there a few slight additions may have been made and that, perhaps, a few explanations made by scribes may have slipped into the text from the margin are not unlikely (Nu 12 3; Dt 34), but this does not affect the general claim of authorship.

Pss 90 is also attributed to M., though attempts have been made to discredit his authorship here also (Deltzsch, Comm. on the Pss). There are those who perhaps still hold to the Mosaic authorship of the Book of Job. But that view was never more than a speculation.

The character of M. as lawgiver is scarcely separable from that of M. as author, but calls for some separate consideration.

2. The Lawgiver (1) The extent of the Mosaic element in the Pent legislation has been so variously estimated that for any adequate idea of the discussion the reader must consult not only other articles (LAW; BOOK OF THE COVENANT; PENTATEUCH) but special works on this subject. In accord with the reasons presented above for the authorship of the Pent in Mosaic times, the great statesman seems most naturally the author of the laws so interwoven with his life and leadership. M. first gave laws concerning the Passover (Ex 13). At Sinai, after the startling revelation from the summit of the mountain, it is most reasonable that M. should gather the people together to covenant with God, and should record that event in the short code of laws known as the Book of the Covenant (Ex 24 7). This code contains the Moral Law (Ex 20 1-17) as fundamental, the constitution of the theocracy and of all ethical living. This is followed by a brief code suitable to their present condition and immediate prospects (Ex 20 24-26; 21-23). Considering the expectations of both leader and people that they would immediately proceed to the promised land and take possession, it is quite in order that there should be laws concerning vineyards and olive orchards (Ex 23 11), and harvests (Ex 23 10-16) and the first-fruits (Ex 23 19). Upon the completion of the tabernacle, a priest-code became a necessity. Accordingly, such a code follows with great minutiae of directions. This part of the Law is composed almost entirely of "laws of procedure" intended primarily for the priests, that they might know their own duties and give oral instruction to the people, and probably was never meant for the whole people except in the most general way. When Israel was turned back into the wilderness, these two codes were quite sufficient for the simple life of the wanderings. But Israel developed. The rabble became a nation. Forty years of life under law, under the operation of the Book of the Covenant in the moralities of life, the PC in their religious exercises, and the brief statutes of Lev for the simple life of the desert, prepared the people for a more elaborate code as they entered the promised land with its more complex life. Accordingly, in Dt that code was recorded and left for the guidance of the people. That these various codes contain some things not now understood is not at all surprising. It would be surprising if they did not. Would not Orientals of today find some things in Western laws quite incomprehensible without explanation?

That some few items of law may have been added at a later time, as some items of history were added to the narrative, is not at all unreasonable, and does in no way invalidate the claim of M. as the lawgiver, any more than later French legislation has invalidated the Corsican's claim to the Napoleonic Code.

The essential value of the Mosaic legislation is beyond comparison. Some of the laws of M., relating as they did to passing problems, have themselves passed away; some of them were definitely abrogated by Christ and others explicitly fulfilled; but much of his legislation, moral, industrial, social and political, is the warp and woof of the best in the great codes of the world to this day. The morality of the Decalogue is unapproached among collections of moral precepts. Its divinity, like the divinity of the teachings of Jesus, lies not only in what it includes, but also in what it omits. The precepts of Ptah-hotep, of Confucius, of Epictetus include many things found in the Decalogue; the Decalogue omits many things found among the maxims of these moralists. Thus in what it excludes, as in what it includes, the perfection of the Decalogue lies.

(2) It should be emphasized that the laws of M. were codes, not a collection of court decisions known to lawyers as common law, but codes given abstractly, not in view of any particular concrete case, and arranged in systematic order (Wiener, Bib. Sac., 1909-10). This is entirely in harmony with the archaeological indications of the Mosaic and preceding ages. The CH, given at least 5 centuries before, is one of the most orderly, methodical and logical codes ever constructed (Lyon, JAOS, XXV, 254).

The career and the works and the character of M. culminate in the prophetic office. It was as prophet that M. was essentially leader. It was as prophet that he held the place of highest eminence in the world until a greater than M. came.

3. The Prophet

(1) The statesman-prophet framed a civil government which illustrated the kingdom of God upon earth. The theocracy did not simulate any government of earth, monarchy, republic or socialistic state. It combined the best elements in all of these and set up the most effective checks which have ever been devised against the evils of each.

(2) The lawgiver-prophet inculcated maxims and laws which set the feet of the people in the way of life, so that, while failing as a law of life in a sinful world, these precepts ever remain as a rule of conduct.

(3) The priest-prophet prepared and gave to Israel a ritual of worship which most completely typified the redemptive mercy of God and which is so wonderfully unfolded in the Ep. to the He, as it has been more wonderfully fulfilled in the life and atoning death of Christ.

(4) In all the multifarious activities of the prophetic career he was a type of Christ, the type of Christ whose work was a "tutor unto Christ."

Moses' revelation of God ever transcends the speculations of theologians about God as a sunrise transcends a treatise on the solar spectrum. While the speculations are cold and lifeless, the revelation is vital and glorious. As an analysis of Raphael's painting of the transfiguration belittles its impression upon the beholder, while a sight of the picture exalts that scene in the mind and heart, so the attempts of theologians to analyze God and bring Him within the grasp of the human mind belittle the conception of God, dwarf it to the capacity of the human intellect, while such a vision of Him as M. gives exalts and glorifies Him beyond expression. Thus while theologians of every school from Athanasius to Ritschl come and go, M. goes on forever; while they stand cold on library shelves, he lives warm in the hearts of men.

Such was the Heb leader, lawgiver, prophet, poet; among mere men, "the foremost man of all this world."

MOSES, ASSUMPTION, a-sump'shun, OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

MOSES, SONG OF: The name given to the song of triumph sung by Moses and the Israelites after the crossing of the Red Sea and the destruction of the hosts of Pharaoh (Ex 15 1-18). The sublimity of this noble ode is universally admitted. In magnificent strains it celebrates the deliverance just experienced, extolling the attributes of Jeh revealed in the triumph (vs 1-12), then anticipates the astonishing effects which would flow from this deliverance in the immediate future and in after-times (vs 13-18). There seems no reason to doubt that at least the basis of the song—possibly the whole—is genuinely Mosaic. In the allusions to the guidance of the people to God's holy habitation, and to the terror of the surrounding peoples and of the Canaanites (vs 13-18), it is thought that traces are manifest of a later revision and expansion. This, however, is by no means a necessary conclusion.

Driver, who in LOT, 8th ed, 30, goes with the critics on this point, wrote more guardedly in the 1st ed (p. 27):

"Probably, however, the greater part of the song is Mosaic, and the modification or expansion is limited to the closing vs; for the general style is antique, and the triumphant tone which pervades it is just such as might naturally have been inspired by the event which it celebrates."

The song of Moses is made the model in the Apocalypse of "the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb," which those standing by the sea of glass, who have "come off victorious from the beast, and from his image, and from the number of his name," sing to God's praise, "Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God, the Almighty," etc (Rev 15 2-4). The church having experienced a deliverance similar to that experienced by Israel at the Red Sea, but infinitely greater, the old song is recast, and its terms are readapted to express both victories, the lower and the higher, at once. MOSOLLAMON, mō-sol'a-mon. See MOSOLLAMUS.

MOSOLLAMUS, mō-sol'a-mus:

(1) AV "Mosollam" (Μοσόλλαμος, Mosóllamos), one of the three "assessors" appointed to the two commissioners in the inquiry made about "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 14) = "Meshullam" in Ezr 10 15.

(2) AV "Mosollamon," one of those sent by Ezra to the captain Loddeus to obtain men who could execute the priest's office (1 Esd 8 44 [LXX 43]) = "Meshullam" in Ezr 8 16 (B reads also Μεσολάβων, Mesolabōn, in 1 Esd 8 44).

MOST HIGH, MOST HOLY. See GOD, NAMES OF.

MOTE, mōt (κάρφος, kárfhos): A minute piece of anything dry or light, as straw, chaff, a splinter of wood, that might enter the eye. Used by Jesus in Mt 7 3 ff; Lk 6 41 f in contrast with "beam," to rebuke officiousness in correcting small faults of others, while cherishing greater ones of our own.

MOTH, moth (עָשׂ, 'āsh; cf Arab. عَنَّة, 'uththat, "moth"; colloquial عَت, 'itt; سَف, šās,

"worm" [Isa 51 8]; cf Arab سوس, sūs, "worm," esp. an insect larva in flesh, wood or grain; سَه, šās, Clothes-Moth (Tinea pellionella).

שֵׂס, "moth" [Mt 6 19, 20; Lk 12 33]; שֵׂסֹבְרוֹט, sēśōbrōt, "moth-eaten" [Jas 5 2]:

The moths constitute the larger division of the order Lepidoptera. Two of the points by which they are distinguished from butterflies are that they are generally nocturnal and that their antennae are not club-shaped. Further, the larva in many cases spins a cocoon for the protection of the pupa or chrysalis, which is never the case with butterflies. The Bib. references are to the clothes-moth, i.e. various species of the genus Tinea, tiny insects which lay their eggs in woollen clothes, upon which the larvae later feed. As the larva feeds it makes a cocoon of its silk together with fibers of the cloth on which it is feeding, so that the color of the cocoon depends upon the color of the fabric. The adult is only indirectly harmful, as it is only in the larval stage that the insect injures clothing. Therefore in Isa 51 8, "For the moth [āsh] shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm [šās] shall eat them like wool," both words must refer to the larva, the distich demanding such a word as šās to balance āsh in the first half. The word "moth" occurs 7 t in the OT, in Job, Pss, Isa and Hos, always in figurative expressions, typifying either that which is destructive (Job 13 28; Ps 39 11; Isa 50 9; 51 8; Hos 5 12) or that which is frail (Job 4 19; 27 18). MOTHER, .muth'ēr (מִתְּ, 'ēm, "mother," "dam," "ancestress"; מִתְּ, mēlēr): In vain do we look in the Scriptures for traces of

1. Her Position in the OT the low position which woman occupies in many eastern lands. A false impression has been created by her present position in the East, esp. under Mohammedan rule. Her place as depicted in the Scriptures is a totally different one. Women there move on the same social plane with men. They often occupy leading public positions (Ex 15 20; Jgs 4 4; 2 K 22 14). The love of offspring was deeply imbedded in the heart of Heb women, and thus motherhood was highly respected. Among the patriarchs women, and esp. mothers, occupy a prominent place. In Rebekah's marriage, her mother seems to have had equal voice with her father and Laban, her brother (Gen 24 28.50.53.55). Jacob "obeyed his father and his mother" (Gen 28 7), and his mother evidently was his chief counselor. The Law places the child under obligation of honoring father and mother alike (Ex 20 12). The child that strikes father or mother or curses either of them is punished by death (Ex 21 15.17). The same fate overtakes the habitually disobedient (Dt 21 18-21).

In one place in the Law, the mother is even placed before the father as the object of filial reverence (Lev 19 3). The Psalmist depicts deepest grief as that of one who mourneth for his mother (Ps 35 14). In the entire Book of Prov the duty of reverence, love and obedience of sons to their mothers is unceasingly inculcated. The greatest comfort imaginable is that wherewith a mother comforts her son (Isa 66 13).

And what is true of the OT is equally true of the NT. The same high type of womanhood, the same reverence for one's mother is in evidence in both books. The birth of

2. Position in the NT Christ lifted motherhood to the highest possible plane and idealized it for all time. The last thing Jesus did on the Cross was to bestow His mother on John "the beloved" as his special inheritance. What woman is today, what she is in particular in her motherhood, she owes wholly to the position in which the Scriptures have placed her. Sometimes the stepmother is spoken of as the real mother (Gen 37 10). Sometimes the grandmother or other female relative is thus spoken of (Gen 3 20; 1 K 15 10).

Tropically the nation is spoken of as a mother and the people are her children (Isa 50 1; Jer 50 12; Hos 2 4; 4 5). Large cities also are "mothers"

(2 S 20 19; cf Gal 4 26; 2 Esd 10 7), and Job even depicts the earth as such (Job 1 21).

MOTION, mō'shun: In 2 Esd 6 14, AV "motion" represents the Lat commotio, "commotion," "disturbance" (RV has revised entirely here). In Rom 7 5, "the motions of sins, which were by the law," "motion" is used in the sense of "impulse," and "impulses" would probably give the best tr. But the Gr noun (παθήματα, pathēmata) is hard to translate exactly, and RV has preferred "passions," as in Gal 5 24. Sanday (ICC) paraphrases "the impressions of sense, suggestive of sin, stimulated into perverse activity by their legal prohibition." See PASSION. "Motion" is found also in Wisd 5 11 (AV and RVm) and 7 24 (AV and RV) in a modern sense. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

MOUNT OF THE AMORITES ("hill-country of the Amorites" [Dt 1 7.20.24; cf Nu 13 29; Josh 10 6, etc]): The region intended is that afterward known as the hill country of Judah and Ephraim, but sometimes "Amorites" is used as a general designation for all the inhabitants of Canaan (Gen 15 16; Josh 24 8.18, etc). See AMORITES.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY: Zereth-shahar is said to be situated in or on the "mount of the valley" (בְּרֵךְ הָעֵמֶק, b'har hā'ēmeq [Josh 13 19]). Cheyne (EB, s.v.) says "i.e. on one of the mountains E. of the Jordan valley (cf ver 27), and not impossibly on that described at length in BJ, VII, vi, 1-3." To the N.W. of this mountain is Wady es-Sara, wherein there may be a reminiscence of Zereth-shahar. There is no certainty.

In addition to frequent references to man and animals, "Their food was yet in their mouths" (Ps 78 30); "And Jeh opened the mouth

1. Literal Sense of the ass" (Nu 22 28); "Save me from the lion's mouth" (Ps 22 21), etc., the term is often used in connection with inanimate things: mouth of a sack (Gen 42 27); of the earth (4 11; Nu 26 10); of a well (29 2.3.8.10); of a cave (Josh 10 18.22.27); of Sheol (Ps 141 7); of the abyss (Jer 48 28); of a furnace (Aram. ṭra', Dnl 3 26); of idols (Ps 115 5; 135 16.17).

(1) The "mouth" denotes language, speech, declaration (cf "lips," "tongue," which see): "By the mouth of" is "by means of," "on the declaration of" (Lk 1 70; Acts

2. Figurative Sense 1 16); "Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be slain at the mouth of witnesses" (Nu 35 30; cf Dt 17 6; Mt 18 16; He 10 28); "I will give you mouth and wisdom" (Lk 21 15); "fool's mouth" (Prov 18 7). (2) "Mouth" also denotes "spokesman": "He shall be to thee a mouth" (Ex 4 16).

Numerous are the idiomatic phrases which have, in part, been introduced into English by means of the language of the Bible. "To put into the mouth," if said of God, denotes Divine inspiration (Dt 18 18; Mic 3 5). "To have words put into the mouth" means to have instructions given (Dt 31 19; 2 S 14 3; Jer 1 9; Ex 4 11-16). "The fruit of the mouth" (Prov 18 20) is synonymical with wisdom, the mature utterance of the wise. "To put one's mouth into the dust" is equivalent with humbling one's self (Lam 3 29; cf "to lay one's horn in the dust," Job 16 15). Silent submission is expressed by "laying the hand upon the mouth" (Jgs 18 19; Job 29 9; 40 4; Mic 7 16); cf "to refrain the lips"; see LIP. "To open the mouth wide" against a person is to accuse him wildly and often wrongfully (Ps 35 21; Isa 57 4), otherwise "to open one's mouth wide," "to have an enlarged mouth" means to have great confidence and joy in speaking or accepting good things (1 S 2 1; Ezk 33 22; 2 Cor 6 11; Eph 6 19). "To gape upon one with the mouth" means to threaten a person (Job 16 10). Divine rebuke is expressed by the "rod of God's mouth" (Isa 11 4), and the Messiah declares "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword" (Isa 49 2; cf Rev 2 16; 19 15.21). Great anguish, such as dying with thirst, is expressed by "the tongue cleaving to the roof of the mouth" (Heb hēkh, Job 29 10; Ps 137 6; cf 22 15).

MOWING, mō'ing, MOWN GRASS (גֶּזֶז, gēz, "a shearing," "cut grass"): In Ps 72 6 the good king's rule is said to be "like rain upon the mown grass," to start the new growth (cf 2 S 23 4; Hos 6 3). "The king's mowings" (Am 7 1) were the portion of the spring herbage taken as tribute by the kings of Israel to feed their horses (cf 1 S 8 15 ff; 18 5). "After the king's mowings" would denote the time when everybody else might turn to reap their greenstuffs (BTP, II, 109). The term "mower" (מִצֵּד, hāṣar, "to dock off," "shorten") in Ps 129 7 AV is rendered "reaper" in RV, and in Jas 5 4 RV has "mow" for ἀμάω, amāō (AV "reap"). See HARVEST; REAPING.

MOZA, mō'za (מִצְעָה, mōṣāh):

MOZAH, mō'za (מִצְעָה, ha-mōṣāh; B, 'Αμοαή, Amōkē, A, 'Αμοσά, Amōsā): A town in the territory of Benjamin named after Mizpeh and Chephirah (Josh 18 26). It may be represented by the modern Beit Mizzeh, the heavy ζ of the Heb passing into the light z of the Arab., a not unusual change. The name means "place of hard stone." The village lies to the N. of Kulōniyeh (possibly Emmaus), about 4 miles N.W. of Jerus.

MUFFLER, muf'lēr (רֶעֶלָה, re'ālāh): The name given to an article of woman's dress in Isa 3 19. It describes a veil more elaborate and costly than the ordinary. A cognate word in the sense of "veiled" is applied in the Mish (Shabbāth, vi.6) to Jewesses from Arabia. See DRESS.

MULBERRY, mul'ber-i, TREES (בְּקָאִים, b-khā'im; LXX ἄπιοι, apioi, "pear trees" [2 S 5 23 f; 1 Ch 14 14 f, m "balsam-trees"; Ps 84 6, AV "Baca," m "mulberry trees," RV "weeping," m "balsam-trees"): According to Arab. writers the Baca tree is similar to the balsam (Balsamodendron obbalsamum), and grows near Mecca; no such tree is, however, known in Pal. The name may, in Heb., have been applied to some species of ACACIA (q.v.). The idea of "weeping" implied in the root, both in Heb and Arab., may be explained by the exudation of gum. "The sound of marching in the tops of the mulberry trees" has been explained to refer to the quivering of the leaves of poplars, but there is not much to support this view (see POPLAR). The tr "mulberry trees" is, however, even more improbable, as this tree, though very plentiful today, had not been introduced into Pal in OT times.

Mulberry (μύρον, móron [1 Macc 6 34]): The Syrians at Bathzacharias "to the end they might provoke the elephants to fight, they shewed them the blood of grapes and mulberries." This reference must be to the deep red juice of the black mulberry (Morus nigra), the tūt shāmi of Pal, a variety cultivated all over the land for its luscious, juicy fruit. See SYCOMORE. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

MULCTED, mulk'ted (מִשְׁנָה, 'ānash, "to be punished," "fined"): "The simple pass on, and are mulcted" (Prov 22 3 RVm, RV "suffer for it," AV "are punished").

MULE, mūl (מִרְדָּה, peredh [1 K 10 25; 18 5; Ezr 2 66; Isa 66 20; Zec 14 15], the fem. מִרְדָּה, pirdāh [1 K 1 33.38.44], רֶקֶשׁ, rekhes, "swift steeds," AV "mules" [Est 8 10.14], מִשְׁתָּרְנִים, 'āhashtrānīm, "used in the king's service," AV "camels," RVm "mules" [Est 8 10.14], יָמִם, yēmim, "hot springs," AV "mules" [Gen 36 24]; ἡμιόλος, hēmíolos, "half-ass," "mule" [1 Esd 5 43; Jth 15 11]): Mules are mentioned as riding animals for princes (2 S 13 29; 18 9; 1 K 1 33.38.44); in the tribute brought to Solomon (2 Ch 9 24); as beasts of burden (2 K 5 17; 1 Ch 12 40); horses and mules are obtained from the "house of Togarmah" in the distant north (Ezk 27 14). The injunction of Ps 32 9, "Be ye not as the horse, or as

At the present day mules are used as pack animals and for drawing freight wagons, rarely for riding. One does not often see in Pal mules as large and fine as are common in Europe and America. This may be because most of the mares and many of the donkeys are small.

MULTITUDE, mul'ti-tūd, MIXED, mikst. See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MUNITION, mû-nish'un. See SIEGE, 4, (b).

MUPPIM, mup'im (מֻפִּים, muppim): A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21), elsewhere called "Shup-pim" (1 Ch 7 12.15; 26 16), "Shephupham" (Nu 26 39), and "Shephuphan" (1 Ch 8 5); cf separate arts. on these names.

MURDER, mûr'dēr (הָרָגָה, hārāgh, "to smite," "destroy," "kill," "slay" [Ps 10 8; Hos 9 13 AV], רָצַח, rāṣah, "to dash to pieces," "kill,"

The pl. of φόνος, phónos, "murders," occurs in Mt 15 19; Mk 7 21; Gal 5 21 AV; Rev 9 21; cf 2 Macc 4 338; 12 6).

The Heb law recognized the distinction between wilful murder and accidental or justifiable homicide

2. The Hebrew Law (Nu 25 16); but in legal language no verbal distinction is made. Murder was always subject to capital punishment (Lev 24 17; cf Gen 9 6). Even if the criminal sought the protection of the sanctuary, he was to be arrested before the altar and to be punished (Ex 21 12.14; Lev 24 17.21; Nu 35 16.18.21.31). The Mish says that a mortal blow intended for another than the victim is punishable with death; but such a provision is not found in the Law. No special mention is made of (a) child murder; (b) parricide; or (c) taking life by poison; but the intention of the law is clear with reference to all these cases (Ex 21 15.17; 1 Tim 1 9; Mt 15 4). No punishment is mentioned for attempted suicide (cf 1 S 31 4; 1 K 16 18; Mt 27 5); yet Joss says (BJ, III, viii, 5) that suicide was held criminal by the Jews (see also Ex 21 23). An animal known to be vicious must be confined, and if it caused the death of anyone, the animal was destroyed and the owner held guilty of murder (Ex 21 29.31). The executioner, according to the terms of the Law, was the "revenger of blood"; but the guilt must be previously determined by the Levitical tribunal. Strong protection was given by the requirement that at least two witnesses must concur in any capital question (Nu 35 19-30; Dt 17 6-12; 19 12.17). Under the monarchy the duty of executing justice on a murderer seems to have been assumed to some extent by the sovereign, who also had power to grant pardon (2 S 13 39; 14 7.11; 1 K 2 34). See MANSAYER.

MURDERERS, mûr'dēr-ērz (Acts 21 38 AV, RV
 tioned in the NT, the Gr word σικάριος, sikários,

Lat sicarius from sica, "a small sword," or "dagger." The word describes the hired assassin, of whom there were bands in the pay of agitators in Rome in the last days of the Republic, who employed them to remove surreptitiously their political opponents. In the later days of the Jewish commonwealth, Judaea became infested with the same type of ruffian, and it is natural that the Rom commandant at Jerus should describe them by the name so well known in the imperial city. See ASSASSINS.

MURMUR, mûr'mur, MURMURINGS, mûr'-mur-ingz: The Heb word (לִיחַן, lûn) denotes the semi-articulated mutterings of disaffected persons. It is used in connection with the complaints of the Israelites in the desert against Jeh on the one hand, and against Moses and Aaron on the other hand (Ex 16 7,8; Nu 14 27,36; 16 11; 17 5). In three places (Dt 1 27; Ps 106 25; Isa 29 24), "murmur" translates a Heb word (רָגַן, râghan) which suggests the malicious whispering of slander.

In the NT “murmur” renders two different words, viz. γογγύζω, goggúzo, and ἐμβριμάσθαι, embrimáomai. The latter word suggests indignation and fault-finding (Mk 14 4 AV). The former word (or a compound of it) is generally used in connection with the complainings of the Pharisees and scribes (Mt 20 11; Lk 5 30; 15 2; 19 7). T. LEWIS

MURRAIN, mur'in, mur'en, mur'ān (מִרְיָן, debber): This name is given to a fatal cattle-disease, which was the fifth of the plagues of Egypt (Ex' 9 3), and which affected not only the flocks and herds, but also the camels, horses and asses. The record of its onset immediately after the plague of flies makes it probable that it was an epizootic, whose germs were carried by these insects as those of rinderpest or splenic fever may be. Cattle plagues have in recent years been very destructive in Egypt; many writers have given descriptions of the great devastation wrought by the outbreak in 1842. In this case Wittmann noted that contact with the putrid carcasses caused severe boils, a condition also recorded in Ex as following the murrain. The very extensive spread of rinderpest within the last few years in many districts of Egypt has not yet been completely stamped out, even in spite of the use of antitoxic serum and the most rigid isolation. The word "murrain" is probably a variant of the Old Fr. morine. It is used as an imprecation by Shakespeare and other Elizabethan writers, and is still applied by herdsmen to several forms of epidemic cattle sickness. Among early writers it was used as well for fatal plagues affecting men; thus Lydgate (1494) speaks of the people "slain by that moreyne."

MUSE, mūz, MUSING, mūz'ing: The word occurs twice in the OT, in the sense of "meditate" (Ps 39 3, hāqhlāh; Ps 143 5, sī'ah); in the NT once (Lk 3 15, dialogizomai, where RV reads "reasoned").

MUSHI, mū'shī (מִשִּׁי, mūshī): Son of Merari (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 20; 1 Ch 6 19 [Heb 4]; 23 21; 24 26). There is found also the patronymic "Mushites" (Nu 3 33; 26 58).

LITERATURE

1. Its Importance.—That the Hebrews were in ancient times, as they are at the present day, devoted to the study and practice of music is obvious to every reader of the OT. The references to it are numerous, and are frequently of such a nature as to emphasize its importance. They occur not only in the Psalter, where we might expect them, but in the Historical Books and the Prophets, in narratives and in declamations of the loftiest meaning and most intense seriousness. And the conclusion drawn from a cursory glance is confirmed by a closer study.

The place held by music in the OT is unique. Besides poetry, it is the

1. The Sole Art Cultivated only art that seems to have been cultivated to any extent in ancient Israel. Painting is entirely, sculpture almost entirely, ignored. This may have been due to the prohibition contained in the Second Commandment, but the fidelity with which that was obeyed is remarkable.

From the traces of it extant in the OT, we can infer that the vocabulary of musical terms was far from scanty. This is all the more significant when we consider the condensed and pregnant nature of Heb. "Song" in our EV represents at least half a dozen words in the original.

The events, occasions, and occupations with which music was associated were extremely varied.

2. Vocabulary It accompanied leave-taking with honored guests (Gen 31 27); celebrated a signal triumph over the nation's enemies (Ex 15 20); and welcomed conquerors returning from victory (Jgs 11 34; 1 S 18 6). It was employed to exorcise an evil spirit (1 S 18 10), and to soothe the temper, or excite the inspiration, of a prophet (2 K 3 15). The words "Destroy not" in the titles of four of the Pss (cf Isa 65 8) most probably are the beginning of a vintage-song, and the markedly rhythmical character of Heb music would indicate that it accompanied and lightened many kinds of work requiring combined and uniform exertion. Processions, as e.g. marriages (1 Macc 9 39) and funerals (2 Ch 35 25), were regulated in a similar way. The Pss headed "Songs of Degrees" were probably the sacred marches sung by the pious as they journeyed to and from the holy festivals at Jerus.

It follows from this that the range of emotion expressed by Heb music was anything but limited.

4. Emotional Range In addition to the passages just quoted, we may mention the jeering songs leveled at Job (Job 30 9). But the music that could be used to interpret or accompany the Pss with any degree of fitness must have been capable of expressing a great variety of moods and feelings. Not only the broadly marked antitheses of joy and sorrow, hope and fear, faith and doubt, but every shade and quality of sentiment are found there. It is hardly possible to suppose that the people who originated all that wealth of emotional utterance should have been without a corresponding ability to invent diversified melodies, or should have been content with the bald and colorless recitative usually attributed to them.

This internal evidence is confirmed by other testimony. The Bab tyrants demanded one of the famous songs of Zion from their Jewish captives (Ps 137 3), and among the presents sent by Hezekiah to Sennacherib there were included male and female musicians. In later times Lat writers attest the influence of the East in matters musical. We need only refer to Juvenal iii.62 ff.

Harp, Lyre and Double Pipe with Men and Women Singing.

By far the most important evidence of the value attached to music by the Hebrews is afforded by the place given to it in Divine service.

5. Place in Divine Service It is true that nothing is said of it in the Pent in connection with the consecration of the tabernacle, or the institution of the various sacrifices or festivals. But this omission proves nothing. It is not perhaps atoned for by the tradition (Wisd 18 9) that at the first paschal celebration "the fathers already led the sacred songs of praise," but the rest of the history makes ample amends. In later days, at all events, music formed an essential part of the national worship of Jeh, and elaborate arrangements were made for its correct and impressive performance. These are detailed in 1 Ch. There we are told that the whole body of the temple chorus and orchestra numbered 4,000; that they were trained and conducted, in 24 divisions, by the sons of Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun; and that in each group experts and novices were combined, so that the former preserved the correct tradition, and the latter were trained and fitted to take their place. This is, no doubt, a description of the arrangements that were carried out in the Second Temple, but it sheds a reflex, if somewhat uncertain, light on those adopted in the First.

We are told by the same authority that every reformation of religion brought with it a reconstruction of the temple chorus and orchestra, and a resumption of their duties. Thus when Hezekiah purged the state and church of the heathenism patronized by Ahaz, "he set the Levites in the house of Jeh with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps" (2 Ch 29 25).

6. In Religious Reformation

6, 12; cf also 1 Ch 15 19-21). The former has been taken to mean "in the manner of maidens," i.e. soprano; the latter "on the lower octave," i.e. tenor or bass. This is plausible, but it is far from convincing. It is hardly probable that the Hebrews had anticipated our modern division of the scale; and the word sh'mînîth or "eighth" may refer to the number of the mode, while ālāmōth is also tr<sup>d</sup> "with Elamite instruments" (Wellhausen). Of one feature of Heb music we may be tolerably sure: it was rendered in unison. It was destitute of harmony or counterpoint. For its effect it would depend on contrast in quality of tone, on the participation of a larger or smaller number of singers, on antiphonal singing, so clearly indicated in many of the Pss, and on the coloring imparted by the

MUSICAL PARTY.

Men and women seated on chairs, women servants pass wine, musicians seated on the ground play, and women dance before them (Brit Mus.).

The same thing took place under Josiah (2 Ch 34). After the restoration—at the dedication of the Temple (Ezr 3 10) and of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 17)—music played a great part. In Nehemiah's time the descendants of the ancient choral guilds drew together, and their maintenance was secured to them out of the public funds in return for their services.

II. Musical Theory.—It is disappointing after all this to have to confess that of the nature of Heb music we have no real knowledge. If 1. Dearth of any system of notation ever existed, Technical it has been entirely lost. Attempts Information have been made to derive one from the accents, and a German organist once wrote a book on the subject. One tune in our hymnals has been borrowed from that source, but it is an accident, if not worse, and the ingenuity of the German organist was quite misdirected. We know nothing of the scales, or tonal system of the Heb, of their intervals or of their method of tuning their instruments. Two terms are supposed by some to refer to pitch, viz. "upon," or "set to Ālāmōth," (Ps 46), and "upon," or "set to the Sh'mînîth" (Pss orchestra. That the latter occasionally played short passages alone has been inferred from the term ṣelāh, a word that occurs 71 t in the Pss. It is rendered in the LXX by diapsalmos, which either means louder playing, forte, or, more probably, an instrumental interlude.

Our knowledge is, therefore, very meager and largely negative. We need not, however, suppose that Heb music was necessarily monotonous and unimpressive, or, to those 2. Not who heard it, harsh and barbarous. Necessarily Music, more than any other of the Unimpress- arts, is justified of her own children, ive and a generation that has slowly learned to enjoy Wagner and Strauss should not rashly condemn the music of the East. No doubt the strains that emanated from the orchestra and chorus of the temple stimulated the religious fervor, and satisfied the aesthetic principles of the Hebrews of old, precisely as the rendering of Bach and Handel excites and soothes the Christian of today.

III. Instruments.—The musical instruments employed by the Hebrews included representatives of the three groups: string, wind, and percussion.

The strings comprised the כִּנּוֹר, kinnōr, נֶבֶל or נֶבֶל, nēbel or nebel; the winds: the שׁוֹפָר, shōphār, or קֶרֶן, keren, חֲצֹצֶרֶת, hāḥōṣṣārāh, חָלִיל, hālīl, and עֵינָב, ‘ūghābh; percussion: תֶּבֶל, tōph, מִצְלִיחַיִם, m’ciltayim, צִלְצִלִים, ṣelṣilīm, מִיִּנְקָעִים, m’na’an’im שְׁלִישִׁים, shālīshīm. Besides these, we have in Dnl: מִשְׁרֹקֵיחָא, mashrōkūhā, סִבְכָא, sabb’kha’, פְּסַנְתֵּרִין, p’santerīn, סִמְפֹּנְיָה, ṣūm-pōnyāh. Further, there are Chaldaean forms of keren and kūhāra.

a punishment for sin the sound of the kinnōr wil cease.
(2) Materials.—We have no exact information as to the materials of which these instruments were made. In 2 S 6 5 AV, mention is made of “instruments made of fir wood” (ERV “cypress”), but the text is probably corrupt, and the reading in 1 Ch 13 8 is preferable. According to 1 K 10 11 f, Hiram’s fleet brought from Ophir quantities of ‘almūgh (2 Ch 2 8; 9 10, ‘algūm) wood, from which, among other things, the kinnōr and nebel were made. Probably this was red sandal-wood.

(1) When used.—The chief of these instruments were the kinnōr and nebel (AV, RV “the harp” and “the psaltery” or “viol”). They
1. Strings were used to accompany vocal music.
In 1 S 10 5, Saul meets a band of prophets singing inspired strains to the music of Jos (Ant, VIII, iii) includes among articles made by Solomon for the temple nēbhālīm and kinnōrōth of electrum. Whether we understand this to have been the mixed metal so named or amber, the frame of the instrument could not have been constructed of it. It may have been used for ornamentation.

We have no trace of metal strings being used by the ancients. The strings of the Heb (minnīm) may have consisted of gut. We read of sheep-gut being employed for the purpose in the Odyssey, xxi. 407. Vegetable fiber was also spun into strings. We need only add that bowed instruments were quite unknown; the strings were plucked with the fingers, or struck with a plectrum.
(a) The kinnōr: The OT gives us no clue to the form or nature of the kinnōr, except that it was portable, comparatively light, and could be played while it was carried in processions or dances. The earliest authority to which we can refer on the subject is the LXX. While in some of the books kinnōr is rendered by kinnūra, or kinūra—evidently a transliteration—in others it is tr*d* by kūhāra. We the nebel, “drum,” “flute,” and kinnōr. In the description of the removal of the ark, we are told that songs were sung with kinnōrōth, nēbhālīm, etc (2 S 6 5). Again, in various passages (1 Ch 15 16; 2 Ch 7 6, etc) we meet with the expression kālē shīr, i.e. instruments of, or suitable for accompanying, song. It is evident that only the flute and strings could render melodies. The music performed on these instruments seems to have been mainly of a joyful nature. It entered into all public and domestic festivities. In Ps 81 2, the kinnōr is called “pleasant,” and Isa 24 8 speaks of the “joy” of the kinnōr. Very striking is the invocation Ps 108 2: the poet in a moment of exhilaration calls upon the two kālē shīr to echo and share his enthusiasm for Jeh. Only once (Isa 16 11) is the kinnōr associated with mourning, and Cheyne infers from this passage “that the kinnōr was used at mourning ceremonies.” But the inference is doubtful; the prophet is merely drawing a comparison between the trembling of the strings of the lyre and the agitation in his own bosom. Again, the Bab captives hang their kinnōrōth on the willows in their dejection (Ps 137 2), and the prophets (Isa 24 8; Ezk 26 13) threaten that as cannot discuss here the question of the trustworthiness of the LXX as an authority for Heb antiquities, but considering the conservatism of the East, esp. in matters of ritual, it seems at least hasty to say offhand, as Wellhausen does, that by the date of its production the whole tradition of ancient music had been lost. The tr, at all events, supplies us with an instrument of which the Hebrews could hardly have been ignorant. The kithara, which in its general outlines resembled the lyre, consisted of a rectilinear-shaped sound box from which rose two arms, connected above by a crossbar; the strings ran down from the latter to the sound-box, to which, or to a bridge on which, they were attached.

The most ancient copy of a kithara in Egypt was found in a grave of the XIIth Dynasty. It is carried by one of a company of immigrant captive Semites, who holds it close to his breast, striking the strings with a plectrum held in his right hand, and plucking them with the fingers of the left. The instrument is very primitive; it resembles a schoolboy's slate with the upper three-fourths of the slate broken out of the frame; but it nevertheless possesses the distinctive characteristics of the kithara. In a grave at Thebes of a somewhat later date, three players are depicted, one of whom plays a kithara, also primitive in form, but with slenderer arms. Gradually, as time advanced, the simple board-like frame assumed a shape more like that afterward elaborated by the Greeks. Numerous examples have been found in Asia Minor, but further developed, esp. as regards the sound-box. It may be noted that, in the Assyrian monuments, the kithara is played along with the harp, as the kinnōr was with the nebel.

The evidence furnished by Jewish coins must not be overlooked. Those stamped with representations of lyre-shaped instruments have been assigned to 142-135 BC, or to 66-70 AD. On one side we have a kithara-like instrument of 3 or more strings, with a sound-box resembling a kettle. It is true that these coins are of a late date, and the form of the instruments shown on them has obviously been modified by Gr taste, but so conservative a people as the Jews would hardly be likely to adopt an essentially foreign object for their coinage.

One objection raised by Wellhausen to the identification of the kithara with the kinnōr may be noted. Jos undoubtedly says (Ant, VII, xii) that the kinnura was played with a plectrum, and in 1 S 16 23 David plays the kinnōr "with his hand." But even if this excludes the use of the plectrum in the particular case, it need not be held to disprove the identity of kinnōr and kinnura. Both methods may have been in use. In paintings discovered at Herculaneum there are several instances of the lyre being played with the hand; and there is no reason for supposing that the Hebrews were restricted to one method of showing their skill, when we know that Greeks and Latins were not.

Since the ancient VSS, then, render kinnōr by kithara, and the kithara, though subsequently developed and beautified by the Greeks, was originally a Sem instrument, it is exceedingly probable, as Riehm says, "that we have to regard the ancient Heb kinnōr, which is designated a kithara, as a still simpler form of the latter instrument. The stringed instruments on the Jewish coins are later, beautified forms of the kinnōr, while the Egypt modifications represent the intermediate stage."

(b) The nebel: The nebel has been identified with many instruments. The literal meaning of the word, "wine-skin," has suggested that it was the bagpipe! Others have thought that it was the lute, and this is supported by reference to the Egypt nfr, which denotes a lute-like instrument frequently depicted on the monuments. The derivation of nbl from nfr is, however, now abandoned; and no long-necked instrument has been found depicted in the possession of a Semite. The kissar was favored by Pfeiffer. Its resonance-box is made of wood, and, the upper side, being covered tightly by a skin, closely resembles a drum. From this rise two arms, connected toward the top by a crossbar; and to the latter the strings are attached. The kissar has, however, only 5 strings, as opposed to 12 ascribed by Jos to the nebel, and the sound-box, instead of being above, as stated by the Fathers, is situated below the strings.

The supposition that the nebel was a dulcimer is not without some justification. The dulcimer was well known in the East. An extremely interesting and important bas-relief in the palace at Kouyunjik represents a company of 28 musicians, of whom 11 are instrumentalists and 15 singers. The procession is headed by 5 men, 3 carrying harps, one a double flute, and one a dulcimer. Two of the harpists and the dulcimer-player appear to be dancing or skipping. Then follow 6 women; 4 have harps, one a double flute, and one a small drum which is fixed upright at the belt, and is played with the fingers of both hands. Besides the players, we see 15 singers, 9 being children, who clap their hands to mark the rhythm.

Assyrian Dulcimer.

One of the women is holding her throat, perhaps to produce the shrill vibrato affected by Pers and Arabian women at the present day. The dulcimer in this picture has been regarded by several Orientalists as the nebel. Wettstein, e.g., says "This instrument can fairly be so designated, if the statement of so many witnesses is correct, that nablium and psalterium are one and the same thing. For the latter corresponds to the Arab. santir, which is derived from the Heb psantirîn, a transliteration of the Gr psaltērion." And the santir is a kind of dulcimer.

This is not conclusive. The word psaltērion was not always restricted to a particular instrument, but sometimes embraced a whole class of stringed instruments. Ovid also regarded the nabla as a harp, not a dulcimer, when he said (Ars Am. iii 329): "Learn to sweep the pleasant nabla with both hands." And, lastly, Jos tells us (Ant, VII, xii) that the nebel was played without a plectrum. The tr of nebel by psaltērion does not, therefore, shut us up to the conclusion that it was a dulcimer; on the contrary, it rather leads to the belief that it was a harp.

Harps of various sizes are very numerous on the Egypt monuments. There is the large and elaborate kind with a well-developed sound-box, that served also as a pediment, at its base. This could not be the nebel, which as we have seen, was easily portable. Then we have a variety of smaller instruments that, while light and easily carried, would scarcely have been sonorous enough for the work assigned to the nebel in the temple services. Besides, the more we learn of the relations of Egypt and Israel, the more clearly do we perceive how little the latter was influenced by the former. But the evidence of the Fathers, which need not be disregarded in a matter of this kind, is decisive against Egypt harps of every shape and size. These have without exception the sound-box at the base, and Augustine (on Ps 42) says expressly that the psaltērion had its sound-box above. This is confirmed by statements of Jerome, Isidore, and others, who contrast two classes of instruments according to the position above or below of the sound-box. Jerome, further, likens the nebel to the Gr Δ.

All the evidence points to the nebel having been the Assyrian harp, of which we have numerous examples in the ruins. We have already referred at length to the bas-relief at Kouyunjik in which it is played by 3 men and 4 women. It is portable, triangular, or, roughly, delta-shaped; it has a sound-box above that slants upward away from the player, and a horizontal bar to which the strings are attached about three-fourths of their length down. The number of the strings on the Assyrian harp ranges from 16 upward, but there may quite well have been fewer in some cases.

(c) Nebel 'āsōr: In Ps 33 2; 144 9, "the psaltery of ten strings" is given as the rendering of nebel 'āsōr; while in Ps 92 3 'āsōr is tr'd "instrument of ten strings." No doubt, as we have just said above, there were harps of less and greater compass—the mention of the number of strings in two or three instances does not necessarily imply different kinds of harps.

(d) Gittith: The word gittith is found in the titles of Ps 8, 81, 84. It is a fem. adj. derived from Gath, but its meaning is quite uncertain. It has been explained to denote (i) some Gittite instrument; the Tg, on Ps 8, gives "on the kithara which was brought from Gath"; or (ii) a melody or march popular in Gath. The LXX renders that Jubal was the "father of all such as handle the harp and pipe." The Heb word here tr<sup>d</sup> "pipe" is ūghābh. It occurs in 3 other places:

2. Winds Joh 21 12; 30 31; Ps 150 4. In the Heb version of Dnl 3 5 it is given as the rendering of sumpōnyāh, i.e. "bagpipe." Jerome tr<sup>s</sup> by organon. The ūghābh was probably a primitive shepherd's pipe or panpipe, though some take it as a general term for instruments of the flute kind, a meaning that suits all the passages cited.

(2) The hālil.—The hālil is first mentioned in 1 S 10 5, where it is played by members of the "concerning the vintage," and may have regarded these pss as having been sung to a popular melody. See above.

(e) The shālīshīm: Shālīshīm occurs in 1 S 18 6, where it is rendered "instruments of music." RV in "triangles, or three stringed instruments." The word seems from the context to represent a musical instrument of some sort, but which is very uncertain. Etymology points to a term involving the number three. The small triangular harp, or trigon, has been suggested, but it would hardly have made its presence felt among a number of drums or tambourines. If the shālīshīm was a harp, it might very well be the nebel, which was also triangular. There is no evidence that the triangle was used by Sem people, or we might have taken it to be the instrument referred to. If it was a percussion instrument, it might possibly be a three-ringed or three-stringed sistrum.

(f) The šabbkhā: Among the instruments mentioned in Dnl 3 5.7 10 occurs the šabbkhā, tr<sup>d</sup> in AV and RV "sackbut," i.e. a trombone, why, it is impossible to say. The LXX renders the word by sambūkē, and this is an instrument frequently mentioned by Gr and Lat writers. Though it is nowhere described, it was no doubt a harp, probably of high pitch. It was a favorite of dissolute women, and we frequently see in their hands in mural pictures a small triangular harp, possibly of a higher range than the trigon.

(g) Nāghinōth: The word nāghinōth occurs in the title of 6 pss, and in the sing. in two others; it is also found elsewhere in the OT. Derived from nāghan, "to touch," esp. to play on a stringed instrument (cf Ps 68 25, where the players, nāghnīm, are contrasted with the singers, shārīm), it evidently means stringed instruments in general.

(1) The ūghābh.—The first mention of a wind instrument occurs in Gen 4 21, where we are told that Jubal was the "father of all such as handle the harp and pipe." It was used (1 K 1 40) at Solomon's accession to the throne; its strains added to the exhilaration of convivial parties (Isa 5 12), accompanied worshippers on their joyous march to the sanctuary (Isa 30 29), or, in turn, echoed the feelings of mourners (Jer 48 36). In 1 Macc 3 45, one of the features of the desolation of the temple consisted in the cessation of the sound of the pipe. From this we see that Ewald's assertion that the flute took no part in the music of the temple is incorrect, at least for the Second Temple.

Double Pipe with Accompaniment of Clapping of Hand

As we should expect from the simplicity of its construction, and the commonness of its materials the flute or pipe was the most ancient and most widely popular of all musical instruments.

Reeds, cane, bone, afterward ivory, were the materials; it was the easiest thing in the world to drill at the center, to pierce a few holes in the rind or bark, as for the mouthpiece, to compress the tube at one end. The simple rustic pattern was soon improved upon. course, nothing like the modern flute with its complicated mechanism was ever achieved, but, esp. on the Egyptian monuments, a variety of patterns is found. There see the obliquely held flute, evidently played, like the Arab. nay, by blowing through a very slight parting of the lips against the edge of the orifice of the tube. Besides this, there are double flutes, which, though apparently an advance on the single flute, are very ancient. These double flutes are either of equal or unequal length, and are connected near the mouth by a piece of leather, or enter the frame of the mouthpiece.

Though the flutes of the East and West resembled each other more closely than the strings, it is to the Assyrian monuments that we must turn for the prototypes of the hālil. The Greeks, as their myths show, regarded Asia Minor as the birthplace of the flute, and no doubt the Hebrews brought it with them from their Assyrian home. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief we see players performing on the double flute. It is apparently furnished with a beaked mouthpiece, like that of the clarinet or flageolet. We cannot determine whether the Israelites used the flute with a mouthpiece, or one like the nay; and it is futile to guess. It is enough to say that they had opportunities of becoming acquainted with both kinds, and may have adopted both.

(3) N'ghilōth.—N'ghilōth occurs only in the title of Ps 5. The context suggests that it is a musical term, and as we explain n'ghilōth as a general term for strings, this word may comprehend the wood-winds. RVm renders "wind instruments."

(4) Nekebh.—In Ezk 28 13 AV, RV, n'kabbim is rendered pipes. This tr is supported by Fetis:

The LXX translates súrigx, or panpipes, and this is most probably the meaning.

(6) The šūmpōnyāh.—Šūmpōnyāh (in Chald sumponia) is another name for a musical instrument found in Dnl 3 5, etc. It is generally supposed to have been the bagpipe, an instrument that at one time was exceedingly popular, even among highly civilized peoples. Nero is said to have been desirous of renown as a piper.

(7) The shōphār keren.—The shōphār was a trumpet, curved at the end like a horn (keren), and no doubt originally was a horn. The two words shōphār and keren are used synonymously in Josh 6 4, 5, where we read shōphār ha-yōbbēlīm and keren ha-yōbbēl. With regard to the meaning of ha-yōbbēl, there is some difference of opinion. RV renders in text "ram's horn," in m "jubilee." The former depends on a statement in the Talm that yōbbēl is Arab. for "ram's horn," but no trace of such a word has been found in Arabic. A suggestion of Pfeiffer's that yōbbēl does not designate the instrument, but the manner of blowing, is advocated by J. Weiss. It gives a good sense in the passages in which yōbbēl occurs in connection with shōphār or keren. Thus in Josh 6 5, we would tr, "when the priests blow triumph on the horn."

The shōphār was used in early times chiefly, perhaps exclusively, for warlike purposes. It gave the signal "to arms" (Jgs 6 34; 1 S 13 3; 2 S 20 1); warned of the approach of the enemy (Am 3 6; Ezk 33 6; Jer 4 5; 6 1); was heard throughout a battle (Am 2 2, etc.); and sounded the recall (2 S 2 28). Afterward it played an important part in connection with religion. It was blown at the proclamation of the Law (Ex 19 13, etc.); and at the opening of the Year of Jubilee (Lev 25 9); heralded the approach of the Ark (2 S 6 15); hailed a new king (2 S 15 10); and is prophetically associated with the Divine judgment and restoration of the chosen people from captivity (Isa 18 3, and often).

(8) The hāççerōth.—We are told (Nu 10 2 ff) that Moses was commanded to make two silver trumpets which should serve to summon the people to the door of the tabernacle; give the signal for breaking up the camp; or call to arms. These instruments were the hāççerōth, which differed from the shōphār in that they were straight, not curved, were always made of metal, and were only blown by the priests. They are shown on the Arch of Titus and on Jewish coins, and are described by Jos (Ant, III, xii, 6). The latter says: "In length it was not quite a yard. It was composed of a narrow tube somewhat thicker than a flute, widened slightly at the mouth to catch the breath, and ended in the form of a bell, like the common trumpets."

the double flute; Ambros: large flutes; and by Jahn: the nay or Arab flute. It is now, however, abandoned, and Jerome's explanation that nekebh means the "setting" of precious stones is generally adopted.

(5) The mashrōkūthā.—Mashrōkūthā, found in Dnl 3 5, etc, is also referred to the wood-winds. The word is derived from shārak, "to hiss" (cf Isa 5 26, where God hisses to summon the Gentiles).

(1) The tōph.—The principal percussion instrument, the tōph, is represented in EV by "tabret" and "timbrel," two words of different origin. "Tabret" is derived from Arab. tambūr, the name of a sort of mandolin. "Timbrel" comes from Lat-Gr tympanum, through the Fr. timbre, a small tambourine. The Arabs of today possess an instrument called the duf, a name that corresponds to the Heb tōph. The duf is a circle of thin wood 11 in. in diameter and 2 in. in depth. Over this is tightly stretched a piece of skin, and in the wood are 5 openings in which thin metal disks are hung loosely; these jingle when the duf is struck by the hand. The tōph probably resembled the duf.

3. Percussion Instruments

Other drums are shown on the Egypt and Assyrian monuments. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief the second last performer beats with his hands a small, barrel-like drum fixed at his waist. In the OT the drum is used on festive occasions; it is not mentioned in connection with Divine service. It was generally played by women, and marked the time at dances or processions (Ex 15 20; Jgs 11 34; 1 S 18 6; Jer 31 4; Ps 150 4). At banquets (Isa 24 8; 30 32; Job 21 12) and at marriages (1 Macc 9 39) it accompanied the kinnōr and nebel. In solemn processions it was also occasionally played by men.

(2) Mēṣullayim, ṣelṣelim.—In 1 Ch 15 19 we read that "Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were appointed, with cymbals of brass to sound aloud." These cymbals are the mēṣullayim (in two places ṣelṣelim). They were very popular in Egypt. A at the top so as to form an oval frame, and supplied with a handle at the lower end. One or more bars were fixed across this frame, and rings or disks loosely strung on these made a jingling noise when the instrument was shaken. This interpretation is supported by the derivation of the word, the Vulg., and the rabbins.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, *mū'zi-kal in'strōō-*ments (שִׁירָה וְכִנּוֹר, shiddāh w-shiddōh): "I gat me . . . musical instruments, and that of all sorts" (Ecc 2 8). Thus AV and ARV; ERV and ARVm "concubines very many." The word occurs only here; the meaning is not certain, but it has nothing to do with music.

MUSICIAN, mū-zish'an, CHIEF. See ASAPH; MUSIC; PSALMS.

MUSTARD, mus'tard (σινάπι, sinapi [Mt 13 31; Mk 4 31; Lk 13 19; Mt 17 20; Lk 17 6]): The minuteness of the seed is referred to in all these passages, while in the first three the large size of the herb growing from it is mentioned. In Mt 13 32 it is described as "greater than the herbs, and becometh a tree" (cf Lk 13 19); in Mk 4 32 it "becometh greater than all the herbs, and putteth out great branches." Several varieties of mustard (Arab. khardal) have notably small seed, and under favorable conditions grow in a few months into very tall herbs—10 to 12 ft. The rapid growth of an annual herb to such a height must always be a striking fact. Sinapis nigra, the black mustard, which is cultivated, S. alba, or white mustard, and S. arvensis, or the charlock (all of N.O. Cruciferae), would, any one of them, suit the requirements of the parable; birds readily alight upon their branches to eat the seed (Mt 13 32, etc), not, be it noted, to build their nests, which is nowhere implied.

Among the rabbis a "grain of mustard" was a common expression for anything very minute, pair made of copper and silver has been found in a grave in Thebes. They are about 5 in. in diameter and have handles fixed in the center. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief we see cymbals of another pattern. These are conical, and provided with handles.

Cylindrical staves slightly bent at one end were also used in Egypt processions. Villoteau, quoted by J. Weiss, describes a bas-relief in which three musicians are seen, of whom one plays the harp, a second the double flute, while a third appears to be marking time by striking two short rods together; this was a method of conducting practised regularly by other ancient nations.

(3) Mēna'an'im.—Lastly in 2 S 6 5 we meet with a word that occurs nowhere else, and whose meaning is quite uncertain. AV translates "cornets," RV "castanets," and in m "sistra." The mēna'an'im may have been the sistrum, an instrument formed of two thin, longish plates, bent together which explains Our Lord's phrase, "faith as a grain of mustard seed" (Mt 17 20; Lk 17 6).

The suggestion that the NT references may allude to a tall shrub Salvadora persica, which grows on the southern shores of the Dead Sea, rests solely upon the fact that this plant is sometimes called khardal by the Arabs, but it has no serious claim to be the sinapi of the Bible.

MUTH-LABBEN, muth-lab'en (מוֹת לַבֵּן, mūth labbēn, "death of Ben," or "of the son"; Ps 9, title). See PSALMS.

MUTILATION, mū-ti-lā'shun. See PUNISHMENTS.

MUTTER, mut'er (הִיָּה, hāghāh [Isa 8 19; 59 3]): An onomatopoetic word, used of the growling of a lion (Isa 31 4), of the "mourning" of a dove (Isa 38 14), or of the human voice, whether speaking inarticulately (Isa 16 7) or articulately (Ps 37 30, "The mouth of the righteous talketh of wisdom"; cf Job 27 4; Prov 8 7, etc). Hence it is only the context that can give to hāghāh the meaning "mutter." No such meaning can be gathered from the context of Isa 59 3, and, in fact, the open shamelessness of the sinners seems to be in point. So the verse should be rendered, "Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue uttereth wickedness." In Isa 8 19 hāghāh describes the tone of voice used by the necromancers in uttering their formulas, "that chirp and that mutter." That this tone was subdued and indistinct is quite probable. See PEEP.

MUZZLE, muz'ī (מִצְוֶה, hāṣam; φειδώ, phimōdō): According to the Deuteronomic injunction (Dt 25 4), the ox was not to be muzzled while treading the corn, i.e. threshing. The muzzle was a guard placed on the mouth of the oxen to prevent them from biting or eating. The threshing ox would have ample opportunity of feeding (cf Hos 10 11). The Deuteronomic injunction is quite in accordance with the humane spirit which inspires it all through. Paul quotes this law in two places (1 Cor 9 9; 1 Tim 5 18) to illustrate his view that the "laborer is worthy of his hire." T. LEWIS

MYNDUS, min'dus (Μύνδος, Mündos): A city of Asia Minor, situated at the extreme western end of a peninsula jutting into the sea (see CARIA). It seems that the city was independent at an early date and that many Jews lived there, for according to 1 Macc 15 23, it was one of the several places to which the Rom senate, in the year 139 BC, sent a letter in their behalf. The place was important only because of the silver mines in its vicinity. The mines were worked from a very early period, even to the Middle Ages, and have therefore given to the place the modern Turkish name, Gumushlu, meaning a silver mine. E. J. BANKS

MYRA, mī'ra (Μόρα, Múra): A city of the ancient country of Lycia about 2½ miles from the coast. Here, according to Acts 27 6, Paul found a corn ship from Alexandria. The city stood upon a hill formed by the openings of two valleys. At an early period Myra was of less importance than was the neighboring city Patara, yet later it became a prominent port for ships from Egypt and Cyprus, and Theodosius II made it the capital of the province. It was also famed as the seat of worship of an Asiatic deity whose name is no longer known. St. Nicholas, a bishop and the patron saint of sailors, is said to have been buried in a church on the road between Myra and Andraki, the port. Here an Arab fleet was destroyed in 807. In 808 Haroun al-Rashid, the renowned kalif of Bagdad, took the city, and here Saewulf landed on his return from Jerus. Dembre is the modern name of the ruins of Myra, which are among the most imposing in that part of Asia Minor. The elaborate details of the decoration of the theater are unusually well preserved, and the rock-hewn tombs about the city bear many bas-reliefs and inscriptions of interest. On the road to Andraki the monastery of St. Nicholas may still be seen. E. J. BANKS

MYRRH, mûr:

(1) מֵר (or מֵר, môr; Arab. murr): This substance is mentioned as valuable for its perfume (Ps 45 8; Prov 7 17; Cant 3 6; 4 14), and as one of the constituents of the holy incense (Ex 30 23; see also Cant 4 6; 5 1.5.13). Môr is generally identified with the "myrrh" of commerce, the dried gum of a species of balsam (Balsamodendron myrrha). This is a stunted tree growing in Arabia, having a light-gray bark; the gum resin exudes in small tear-like drops which dry to a rich brown or reddish-yellow, brittle substance, with a faint though agreeable smell and a warm, bitter taste. It is still used as medicine (Mk 15 23). On account, however, of the references to "flowing myrrh" (Ex 30 23) and "liquid myrrh" (Cant 5 5.13), Schweinfurth maintains that môr was not a dried gum but the liquid balsam of Balsamodendron opobalsamum. See BALSAM.

Whichever view is correct, it is probable that the σμύrna, smûrna, of the NT was the same. In Mt 2 11 it is brought by the "Wise men" of the East as an offering to the infant Saviour; in Mk 15 23 it is offered mingled with wine as an anaesthetic to the suffering Redeemer, and in Jn 19 39 a "mixture of myrrh and aloes" is brought by Nicodemus to embalm the sacred body.

(2) מֵר, lô; στακτή, staktē; תֵּרֵל "myrrh" in Gen 37 25, m "ladanum"; 43 11): The fragrant resin obtained from some species of cistus and called in Arab. lādham, in Lat ladanum. The cistus or "rock rose" is exceedingly common all over the mountains of Pal (see BOTANY), the usual varieties being the C. villosus with pink petals, and the C. salviaefolius with white petals. No commerce is done now in Pal in this substance as of old (Gen 37 25; 43 11), but it is still gathered from various species of cistus, esp. C. creticus in the Gr Isles, where it is collected by threshing the plants by a kind of flail from which the sticky mass is scraped off with a knife and rolled into small black balls. In Cyprus at the present time the gum is collected from the beards of the goats that browse on these shrubs, as was done in the days of Herodotus (iii.112).

Myrrh (Balsamodendron myrrha).

MYRTLE, mûr't'l (מֵרְיָל, hādhaṣ; μυρτιά, mur-sinē [Isa 41 19; 55 13; Neh 8 15; Zec 1 8.10 f]; also as a name in Hadassah in Est 2 7, the Jewish form of ESTHER [q.v.]): The myrtle, Myrtus communis (N.O. Myrtaceae), is a very common indigenous shrub all over Pal. On the bare hillsides it is a low bush, but under favorable conditions of moisture it attains a considerable height (cf Zec 1 8.10). It has dark green, scented leaves, delicate starry white flowers and dark-colored berries, which are eaten. In ancient times it was sacred to Asartate. It is mentioned as one of the choice plants of the land (Isa 41 19). "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree; and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree" (Isa 55 13), is one of the prophetic pictures of God's promised blessings. It was one of the trees used in the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh 8 15): "the branches of thick trees" (q.v.) are interpreted in the Talm (Suk. 3 4; Yer Suk. 3, 53d) as myrtle boughs; also (id) the "thick trees" of Neh 8 15 as "wild myrtle." Myrtle twigs, particularly those of the broad-leaved variety, together with a palm branch and twigs of willow, are still used in the ritual of the Feast of Tabernacles. For many references to myrtle in Jewish writings see Jew Enc, IX, 137.

MYSLIA, mish'i-a (Μυσία, Musia): A country in the northwestern part of Asia Minor, which formed an important part of the Rom province of Asia. Though its boundaries were always vague, it may be said to have extended on the N. to the Sea of Marmora, on the E. to Bithynia and Phrygia, on the S. to Lydia, and on the W. to the Hellespont. According to some authors it included the Troad. Its history is chiefly that of its important cities, of which Assos, Troas, and Adramyttium on the border of Lydia, are mentioned in the NT. When Mysia became a part of the Rom province of Asia in 190 BC, its old name fell into disuse, and it was then generally known as the Hellespontus. According to Acts 16 7,8, Paul passed through the country, but without stopping to preach, until he reached Troas on the coast, yet tradition says that he founded churches at Póketos and Cyzius. Onesiphorus, who was martyred some time between 109 and 114 AD, during the proconsulate of Adrian, is supposed to have evangelized this part of Asia. See Expos T, IX, 495 f. E. J. BANKS

MYSTERY, mis'tér-i (μυστήριον, mustērion; from μύστης, mústēs, "one initiated into mysteries"; mulō, "to initiate," mūō, "to close" the lips or the eyes; stem mu, a sound produced with closed lips; cf Lat mutus, "dumb"): Its usual modern meaning (=something in itself obscure or incomprehensible, difficult or impossible to understand) does not convey the exact sense of the Gr mustērion, which means a secret imparted only to the initiated, what is unknown until it is revealed, whether it be easy or hard to understand. The idea of incomprehensibility, if implied at all, is purely accidental. The history of the word in ancient paganism is important, and must be considered before we examine its Bib. usage.

In the extant classics, the sing. is found once only (Menander, "Do not tell thy secret [mustērion] to thy friend"). But it is frequently found

1. In Ancient Pagan Religions in the pl. tá mustēria, "the Mysteries," the technical term for the secret rites and celebrations in ancient religions only known to, and practised by, those who had been initiated. These are among the most interesting, significant, and yet baffling religious phenomena in the Gr-Rom world, esp. from the 6th cent. BC onward. In proportion as the public cults of the civic and national deities fell into disrepute, their place came more and more to be filled by secret cults open only to those who voluntarily underwent elaborate preliminary preparations. There was scarcely one of the ancient deities in connection with whose worship there was not some subsidiary cult of this kind. The most famous were the Mysteries celebrated in Eleusis, under the patronage and control of the Athenian state, and associated with the worship of Demeter and her daughter Persephone. But there were many others of a more private character than the Eleusinian, e.g. the Orphic Mysteries, associated with the name of Dionysus. Besides the Gr Mysteries, mention should be made of the Egyp cults of Isis and Serapis, and of Pers Mithraism, which in the 3d cent. AD was widely diffused over the whole empire.

It is difficult in a brief paragraph to characterize the Mysteries, so elaborate and varied were they, and so completely foreign to the modern mind. The following are some of their main features: (1) Their appeal was to the emotions rather than to the intellect. Lobbeck in his famous Aglaophamus destroyed the once prevalent view that the Mysteries enshrined some profound religious truth or esoteric doctrine. They were rather an attempt to find a more emotional and ecstatic expression to religious aspiration than the public ceremonies provided. Aristotle (as quoted by Synesius) declared that the initiated did not receive definite instruction, but were put in a certain frame of mind (ὅν μυσταὶ τι δεῖν ἀλλὰ παθεῖν, οὐ μαθεῖν τί δεῖν ἀλλὰ παθεῖν). This does not mean that there was no teaching, but that the teaching was vague, suggestive and symbolic, rather than didactic or dogmatic. (2) The chief purpose of the rites seems to have been to secure for the votaries a mystic union with some deity and a guaranty of a blissful immortality. The initiated was made to partake mystically in the passing of the deity through death to life, and this union with his saviour-god (θεὸς σωτήρ, theos sōtēr) became the pledge of his own passage through death to a happy life beyond. This was not taught as an esoteric doctrine; it was well known to outsiders that the Mysteries taught the greater blessedness of the initiated in the under-world; but in the actual ceremony the truth was vividly presented and emotionally realized.

(3) The celebrations were marked by profuse symbolism of word and action. They were preceded by rites of purification through which all the mystae had to pass. The celebrations themselves were in the main a kind of religious drama, consisting of scenic representations illustrating the story of some deity or deities, on the basis of the old mythologies regarded as allegories of Nature's productive forces and of human immortality; combined with the recital of certain mystic formulae by the hierophant (the priest). The culminating point was the ἐκκρησία, epopteia, or full vision, when the hierophant revealed certain holy objects to the assembly. (4) The cults were marked by a strict exclusiveness and secrecy. None but the initiated could be present at the services, and the knowledge of what was said and done was scrupulously kept from outsiders. What they had seen and heard was so sacred that it was sacrilege to divulge it to the uninitiated. (5) Yet the Mysteries were not secret societies, but were open to all who chose to be initiated (except barbarians and criminals). They thus stood in marked contrast to the old civic and national cults, which were confined to states or cities. They substituted the principle of initiation for the more exclusive principle of birthright or nationality; and so foreshadowed the disintegration of old barriers, and prepared the way for the universal religion. Thus the mystery-religions strangely combined a strict exclusiveness with a kind of incipient catholicity. This brief account will show that the Mysteries were not devoid of noble elements. They formed "the serious part of pagan religion" (Renan). But it must also be remembered that they lent themselves to grave extravagances and abuses. Esp. did they suffer from the fact that they were withheld from the light of healthy publicity.

The religion of the OT has no Mysteries of the above type. The ritual of Israel was one in which

2. In the OT and the Apoc the whole people partook, through their representatives the priests. There was no system of ceremonial initiation by which the few had privileges denied to the many. God has

His secrets, but such things as He revealed belonged to all (Dt 29 29); so far from silence being enjoined concerning them, they were openly proclaimed (Dt 6 7; Neh 8 1 ff). True piety alone initiated men into confidential intercourse with Jeh (Ps 25 14; Prov 3 32). The term "mystery" never occurs in the Eng. OT. The Gr word mustērion occurs in the LXX of the OT only in Dnl, where it is found several times as the tr of סֵתֶר, rāzā, "a secret," in reference to the king's dream, the meaning of which was revealed to Daniel (2 18.19.27-30.47).

In the Apoc, mustērion is still used in the sense of "a secret" (a meaning practically confined to the LXX in extant Gr); of the secrets of private life, esp. between friends (Sir 22 22; 27 16.17.21), and of the secret plans of a king or a state (Tob 12 7.11; Jth 2 2; 2 Macc 13 21). The term is also used of the hidden purpose or counsel of God or of Divine wisdom. The wicked "knew not the mysteries of God," i.e. the secret counsels that govern God's dealings with the godly (Wisd 2 22); wisdom "is initiated [μυσταίς, mústis] into the knowledge of God" (8 4), but (unlike the pagan mystagogues) the writer declares he "will not hide mysteries," but will "bring the knowledge of her [wisdom] into clear light" (6 22). Hatch maintains that the analogy here is that of an oriental king's secrets, known only to himself and his trusted friends (Essays in Bib. Gr. 58); but it is more likely that the writer here betrays the influence of the phraseology of the Gr Mysteries (without acquiescing in their teaching). In another passage, at any rate, he shows acquaintance with the secret rites of the Gentiles, viz. in 14 15.23, where the "solemn rites" and "secret mysteries" of idolaters are referred to with abhorrence. The term "mystery" is not used in reference to the special ritual of Israel.

In the NT the word occurs 27 or (if we include the doubtful reading in 1 Cor 2 1) 28 t; chiefly in

3. In the NT Paul (20 or 21 t), but also in one passage reported by each of the synopsists, and 4 t in Rev. It bears its ancient sense of a revealed secret, not its modern sense of that which cannot be fathomed or comprehended. (1) In a few passages, it has reference to a symbol, allegory or parable, which conceals its meaning from those who look only at the literal sense, but is the medium of revelation to those who have the key to its interpretation (cf the rabbinic use of  $\text{ἡ ἀπόκρυφος}$ , rāzā, and  $\text{סוד}$ , sōdh, "the hidden or mystic sense"). This meaning appears in Rev 1 20; 17 5.7; probably also in Eph 5 32, where marriage is called "a mystery," i.e. a symbol to be allegorically interpreted of Christ and His church. It also seems implied in the only passage in which the word is attributed to Our Lord, "Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in ables" (Mk 4 11; cf || Mt 13 11; Lk 8 10).

Here parables are spoken of as a veiled or symbolic form of utterance which concealed the truth from those without the kingdom, but revealed it to those who had the key to its inner meaning (cf Mt 13 35; Jn 16 29 m). (2) By far the most common meaning in the NT is that which is so characteristic of Paul, viz. a Divine truth once hidden, but now revealed in the gospel. Rom 16 25 f might almost be taken as a definition of it, "According to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which hath been kept in silence through times eternal, but now is manifested" (cf Col 1 26; Eph 3 3 ff). (a) It should be noted how closely "mystery" is associated with "revelation" ( $\text{ἀποκάλυψις}$ , apokálypsis), as well as with words of similar import, e.g. "to make known" (Eph 1 9; 3 3.5.10; 6 19), "to manifest" (Col 4 3.4; Rom 16 26; 1 Tim 3 16). "Mystery" and "revelation" are in fact correlative and almost synonymous terms. The mysteries of Christianity are its revealed doctrines, in contrast to the wisdom of worldly philosophy (see esp. 1 Cor 2 1-16; cf Mt 11 25 f); the point of contrast being, not that the latter is comprehensible while the former are obscure, but that the latter is the product of intellectual research, while the former are the result of Divine revelation and are spiritually discerned. (b) From this it follows that Christianity has no secret doctrines, for what was once hidden has now been revealed. But here arises a seeming contradiction. On the one hand, there are passages which seem to imply a doctrine of reserve. The mystery revealed to some would seem to be still concealed from others. The doctrines of Christ and of His Kingdom are hidden from the worldly wise and the prudent (Mt 11 25; 1 Cor 2 6 ff), and from all who are outside the kingdom (Mt 13 11 ff and ||), and there are truths withheld even from Christians while in an elementary stage of development (1 Cor 3 1 ff; He 5 11-14). On the other hand, there are many passages in which the truths of revelation are said to be freely and unreservedly communicated to all (e.g. Mt 10 27; 28 19; Acts 20 20.27; 2 Cor 3 12 f; Eph 3 9, "all men"; 6 19 f; Col 1 28; 1 Tim 2 4). The explanation is that the communication is limited, not by any secrecy in the gospel message itself or any reserve on the part of the speaker, but by the receptive capacity of the hearer. In the case of the carnally-minded, moral obtuseness or worldliness makes them blind to the light which shines on them (2 Cor 4 2-4). In the case of the "babe in Christ," the apparent reserve is merely to the pedagogical principle of adapting the teaching to the progressive receptivity of the disciple (Jn 16 12 f). There is no esoteric doctrine or intentional reserve in the NT. The strong usage in Mt 13 11-15 is due to the Heb mode of speech by which an actual result is stated as if it were purposive. (c) What, then, is the content of the Christian "mystery"? In a wide sense it is the whole gospel, God's world-embracing purpose of redemption through Christ (e.g. Rom 16 25; Eph 6 19; Col 2 2; 1 Tim 3 9). In a special sense it is applied to some specific doctrine or aspect of the gospel, such as the doctrine of the Cross (1 Cor 2 1.7), of the Incarnation (1 Tim 3 16), of the indwelling of Christ as the pledge of immortality

(Col 1 27), of the temporary unbelief of the Jews to be followed by their final restoration (Rom 11 25), of the transformation of the saints who will live to see the Second Advent (1 Cor 15 51), and of the inclusion of the Gentiles in the gospel salvation (Eph 3 3-6). These are the Divine secrets now at last disclosed. In direct antithesis to the Divine mystery is the "mystery of lawlessness" (2 Thess 2 7) culminating in the coming of the Antichrist. Here, too, the word means a revealed secret, only in this case the revelation belongs to the future (ver 8), though the evil forces which are to bring about its consummation are already silently operative. (Besides the references in this paragraph, the word occurs in 1 Cor 4 1; 13 2; 14 2; Rev 10 7. It is interesting to note that the Vulg. sometimes renders mysterion by Lat sacramentum, viz. in Eph 1 9; 3 3.9; 5 32; 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 1 20. This rendering in Eph 5 32 led to the ecclesiastical doctrine that marriage is a "sacrament.")

The question is now frequently discussed, how far the NT (and esp. Paul) betrays the influence of the heathen mystery-cults. Hatch maintains that the Pauline usage of the word mysterion is dependent on the LXX, esp. on the Apoc (op. cit.); and the NT and in this he is followed by Anrich, who declares that the attempt to trace an allusion to the Mysteries in the NT is wholly unsuccessful; but Lightfoot admits a verbal dependence on the pagan Mysteries (Comm. on Col 1 26).

At present there is a strong tendency to attribute to Paul far more dependence than one of phraseology only, and to find in the Mysteries the key to the non-Jewish side of Paulinism. A. Loisy finds affinity to the mystery-religions in Paul's conception of Jesus as a Saviour-God, holding a place analogous to the deities Mithra, Osiris, and Attis; in the place Paul assigns to baptism as the rite of initiation; and in his transformation of the Lord's Supper into a symbol of mystic participation in the flesh and blood of a celestial being and a guaranty of a share in the blissful immortality of the risen Saviour. "In its worship as in its belief, Christianity is a religion of mystery" (art. in Hibbert Journal, October, 1911). Percy Gardner traces similar analogies to the Mysteries in Paul, though he finds in these analogies, not conscious plagiarism, but "the parallel working of similar forces" (Religious Experience of Paul, chs iv, v). Kirsopp Lake writes, "Christianity has not borrowed from the mystery-religions, because it was always, at least in Europe, mystery-religion itself" (The Earlier Epp. of Paul, 215). On the other hand, Schweitzer wholly denies the hypothesis of the direct or indirect influence of the Mysteries on Paul's thought (Geschichte der Paulinischen Forschung).

The whole question is sub judice among scholars, and until more evidence be forthcoming from inscriptions, etc., we shall perhaps vainly expect a unanimous verdict. It can hardly be doubted that at least the language of Paul, and perhaps to some extent his thought, is colored by the phraseology current among the cults. Paul had a remarkably sympathetic and receptive mind, by no means closed to influences from the Gr-Rom environment of his day.

Witness his use of illustrations drawn from the athletic festivals, the Gr theater (1 Cor 4 9) and the Rom camp. He must have been constantly exposed to the contagion of the mystic societies. Tarsus was a seat of the Mithra religion; and the chief centers of Paul's activities, e.g. Corinth, Antioch and Ephesus, were headquarters of mystic religion. We are not surprised that he should have borrowed from the vocabulary of the Mysteries, not only the word mysterion, but μεμύημαι, memūmai, "I learned the secret," lit. "I have been initiated" (Phil 4 12); σφραγισθαι, sphragizesthai, "to be sealed" (Eph 1 13, etc); τέλειος, teleios, "perfect," a term applied in the Mysteries to the fully instructed as opposed to novices (1 Cor 2 6.7; Col 1 28, etc) (note, outside of Paul, ἐπίωται, epōptai, "eye-witnesses," 2 Pet 1 16).

Further, the secret of Paul's gospel among the Gentiles lay, humanly speaking, in the fact that it contained elements that appealed to what was best and most vital in contemporary thought; and doubtless the Mysteries, by transcending all lines of mere citizenship, prepared the way for the universal religion. On the other hand, we must beware of a too facile acceptance of this hypothesis in its extreme form. Christianity can be adequately explained only by reference, not to what it had in common with other religions, but to what was distinctive and original in it. Paul was after all a Jew (though a broad one), who always retained traces of his Pharisaic training, and who viewed idolatry with abhorrence; and the chief formative factor of his thinking was his own profound religious experience. It is inconceivable that such a man should so assimilate gentile modes of thought as to be completely colored by them. The characteristics which his teaching has in common with the pagan religions are simply a witness to the common religious wants of mankind, and not to his indebtedness to them. What turned these religions into Mysteries was the secrecy of their rites; but in the NT there are no secret rites. The gospel "mystery" (as we have seen) is not a secret deliberately withheld from the multitude and revealed only to a privileged religious aristocracy, but something which was once a secret and is so no longer. The perfect openness of Christ and His apostles sets them in a world apart from the mystic schools. It is true that later the Mysteries exercised a great influence on ecclesiastical doctrine and practice, esp. on baptism and the Eucharist (see Hatch, Hibbert Lects., ch x). But in the NT, acts of worship are not as yet regarded as mystic rites. The most we can say is that some NT writers (esp. Paul) make use of expressions and analogies derived from the mystery-religions; but, so far as our present evidence goes, we cannot agree that the pagan cults exercised a central or formative influence on them.

LITERATURE.—There is a large and growing lit. on this subject. Its modern scientific study began with C. A. Lobeck's Aglaophamus (1829). ## N

NAAM, nā'am (נָאֵם, na'am): A son of Caleb (1 Ch 4 15).

NAAMAH, nā'a-ma (נָאֵמָה, na'amāh, "pleasant"; Νοεμά, Noemá):

(1) Daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen 4 22; cf Jos, Ant., I, ii, 2).

(2) An Ammonitish woman whom Solomon married, and who became the mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14 21; 2 Ch 12 13). According to an addition in LXX following 1 K 12 24, "her name was Naaman, the daughter of Ana [Hanun] son of N-hash, king of the sons of Ammon" (see Benzinger, Könige, in loc.).

NAAMAH:

(1) One of a group of 16 lowland (Shephelah) cities forming part of Judah's inheritance (Josh 15 41).

(2) The home of Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, etc). See NAAMATHITE.

NAAMAN, nā'a-man (נָאֵמָן, na'amān, "pleasantness"; LXX BA, Ναϊμάν, Naimán; so WH in the NT; TR, Neēmān):

(1) A successful Syrian general, high in the confidence and esteem of the king of Syria, and honored by his fellow-countrymen as their deliverer (2 K 5 1-27). Afflicted with leprosy, he heard from a Heb slave-maid in his household of the wonder-working powers of an Israelitish prophet. Sent by his master with a letter couched in somewhat peremptory terms to the king of Israel, he came to Samaria for healing. The king of Israel was filled with suspicion and alarm by the demands of the letter, and rent his clothes; but Elisha the prophet intervened, and sent word to Naaman that he must bathe himself seven times in the Jordan. He at first haughtily resented the humiliation and declined the cure; but on the remonstrance of his attendants he yielded and obtained cleansing. At once he returned to Samaria, testified his gratitude by the offer of large gifts to the prophet, confessed his faith in Elisha's God, and sought leave to take home with him enough of the soil of Canaan for the erection of an altar to Jeh.

The narrative is throughout consistent and natural, admirably and accurately depicting the condition of the two kingdoms at the time. The character of Naaman is at once attractive and manly. His impulsive patriotic preference for the streams of his own land does not lessen the reader's esteem for him, and the favorable impression is deepened by his hearty gratitude and kindness.

The Israelitish king is most probably Jehoram, son of Ahab, and the Syrian monarch Ben-hadad II. Jos (Ant., VIII, xv, 5) identifies Naaman with the man who drew his bow at a venture, and gave Ahab his death wound (1 K 22 34). There is one reference to Naaman in the NT. In Lk 4 27, Jesus, rebuking Jewish exclusiveness, mentions "Naaman the Syrian."

(2) A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21.6). Fuller and more precise is the description of Nu 26 38.40, where he is said to be a son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (see also 1 Ch 8 3 f). JOHN A. LEES

NAAMATHITE, nā'a-ma-thīt, nā-am'a-thīt (נָאֵמָתִי, na'amāthī, "a dweller in Naaman"; ὁ Μ[ε]λατων βασιλεὺς, ho M[e]lētāōn basileús): The description of Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11; 11 1; 20 1, etc). Naamah is too common a place-name to permit of the identification of Zophar's home; LXX renders "king of the Minaeans."

NAAMITE, nā'a-mīt (נָאֵמִי, ha-na'amī, "the Naamite"): A family which traced its descent from Naaman (Nu 26 40). See NAAMAN, (2).

NAARAH, nā'a-ra (נָאֵרָה, na'ārāh, "a girl"): One of the two wives of Ashhur, father of Tekoa (1 Ch 4 5).
